A Newcomers Guide to Scanning

by D Norris

1) Introduction – (Why Scanning?)

Ever since the earliest days of radio itself, many have gained a great deal of knowledge and pleasure from listening on the airwaves. However, until the mid to late 1980s there was little equipment available to those with an interest in VHF (and higher) frequencies. Although for many years, the area of spectrum below 30Mhz was quite easily accessible to the typical listener, with all the equipment needed available on most high streets. In the earliest days even broadcast radio lay beyond the budget of many of the population, however as radio technology matured it became accessible to an ever-greater audience. Curiosity has long motivated hobbyists to buy or build radio receivers that can hear long distance 'short-wave' stations on so-called high frequencies in the 3 – 30 MHz range, including international broadcast stations and amateur stations. Remember that at the time that the designations were introduced, frequencies in this range were considered to be high – even engineering VHF equipment was difficult given the technology available at the time. In fact the police were once limited to using HF equipment in just a handful of their cars, and the marine VHF band started out with 50KHz channel spacing; this would be considered grossly wasteful today! For this reason, the channels were sub-divided later giving 25KHz occupancy, hence the reason the channel numbers are out of sequence to this day.

Two-way communications further up into the radio spectrum remained largely out of bounds to the listener- until suitable receiving equipment could be manufactured at a reasonable price. But in the heyday of CB radio in the late 1970s and early 1980s, the first crystal operated radio 'scanners' appeared, able to tune in turn each crystal governed frequency. Since then scanners have evolved to store and scan hundreds or thousands of radio frequencies and even receive exotic communications like data modes and so called 'trunked' systems, all thanks to modern microprocessors. So now for a (necessarily brief) introduction to the history of scanner development.

History

The first scanners were indeed crystal-controlled, like much of the existing radio equipment on the market. A separate crystal was needed for each frequency the hobbyist wished to receive, at a cost of several pounds! So a majority of listeners only attempted to monitor a handful of frequencies. Such scanners are now useful only as collectors' items, and may be found on Ebay under such a collectors' items category. Needless to say, nowadays few hobbyists even remember crystal-operated scanners. Let alone own one!

But it was around this time that the first reasonably priced scanners, offering reasonable features and performance, appeared on the market, which were within range of most people's budgets.
The first programmable scanning receivers became widely available in the early 1980's and typically only had ten channels or so. Most of these did not even offer a search facility so obviously only frequencies known to the user could be monitored. Indeed the Bearcat scanner I first owned even displayed just a channel number. So if I pressed the 'review' button 433.125 MHz would sequentially display simply as 4-3-3-.-1-2-5! Tedious in the extreme, but at least this was an obvious improvement to having to order a new crystal whenever I wanted to monitor a new frequency! But from the mid-1980s onwards, these basic programmable scanners were soon forgotten. I remember owning my first such scanner, a Realistic PRO-2004 from Tandy electronics, which had 300 channels in 10 banks, an easy to use search facility (now nobody's frequency was safe from me!), and continuous coverage from 25 to 520 and 760 to 1300 MHz, with selectable tuning steps. In other words, everything from CB radio to microwave amateur radio stations, and everything in between, except for part of the television broadcast band!

Let's compare this with my previous scanner offering only narrowband FM coverage in the 29-54, 136 to 174 and 406 to 512 MHz range. The older Bearcat scanner (intended for the US market, as evidenced by the US low band coverage rather than the UK low band, 66 to 88 MHz) could not receive CB radio, any UK low band PMR or the fire service, the 4 metre amateur band, either the civil or military aviation bands, the trunked systems in the 'band 3' area (used by television in most countries but not the UK since 1985), FM broadcast or TV audio (not what one buys a scanner to listen to exactly, but useful in that one need not take along a separate radio just to listen to the news weather or football), the analogue cellular telephone service or the 23 CM amateur band, to name just a brief few! This new Pro-2004 excluded only a section of the television broadcast band; otherwise one could tune right from CB frequencies to the edge of the microwave spectrum. The scanner allowed wide-band FM mode for television and FM broadcast reception as mentioned, and AM reception for air band and a few other UK services using AM elsewhere. Also, tuning steps could also be selected (from 5, 12.5, 25 or 50 KHz). There were some scanners also available which had automatic mode switching, giving AM reception on air band and FM throughout the remainder of the coverage, but as there were a few users of FM in the military air band and some AM users elsewhere at VHF and UHF in the UK, this was limiting indeed. Most such scanners were intended for the US market.

In the early years of scanning, the 900MHz cellular band (base stations in the 917 to 950, and portables in the 872 to 905 MHz band) was easy to monitor, although initially scanners covering this area were rather expensive since they were difficult to make. But by mid 2001 the analogue mobile phones had been phased out in favour of digital GSM, which encrypts all voice traffic. So this band is not of much interest now, but there are some cordless microphones and broadcast links in the UHF television band, and in the space just above the television band (which extends from 470 to 855 MHz in the UK). Also there is the 23CM amateur band from 1240 to 1325 MHz, and some radio microphones and talkback in and above the television frequencies, so coverage above 470 MHz is of some value.

At the time of writing, the police have now almost countrywide migrated to the encrypted digital TETRA system, and in all probability the fire and ambulance services will eventually follow. But having said that, there are more and more interesting users of radio appearing, and the number of features offered by scanners continues to grow. So I do feel that the hobby of scanning will continue despite such setbacks.

A whole new science was in fact born in the early days of radio listening, since different parts of the radio spectrum exhibited vastly differing properties which were greatly dependent not only on the frequency in question, but on a great variety of factors. One of the commonest questions asked by newcomers to the hobby is inevitably "over what distance can I hear signals?" At a glance this sounds a very straightforward question – however I am afraid the answer is anything but straightforward. I will at a later stage provide some guidance regarding propagation and those factors affecting the effectiveness of your set-up, which are under your control. However, before delving into any of this, it is worth explaining what you stand to gain from this unique hobby.

Unlike broadcast transmissions in particular, most communication signals are very intermittent, and this ultimately lead to the development of the 'scanning receiver' or 'scanner' which was capable of automated searches through a set number of frequencies, until it detected one in use. The scanner then remained on the frequency until such time as it became quiet once again, at which point it would resume scanning. Whereas most radios are, of course, intended to be 'single purpose' (for example your car radio receives only broadcast stations, and your CB radio receives only CB channels), a scanner can receive over a staggering range of frequencies.

So, once you have bought your VHF/UHF scanner, what can you expect to hear? Well, as you possibly, depending on your background, may already be aware, signals at VHF frequencies and above (with certain exceptions) travel in relatively straight lines and do not generally travel far beyond the transmitter's horizon. This is the reason why as many as 600 or so transmitter sites are required to provide (more or less) the whole population of the United Kingdom with terrestrial UHF television. On the other hand, listeners to the civil aviation band will know that aircraft flying at high altitude can be heard 300 miles away or more! This is possible simply because the plane is above the listeners 'radio horizon' and can in effect be 'seen' by the receiving aerial.

In short, at VHF and higher frequencies increasing the transmitter power will improve coverage within the service area somewhat but will not greatly extend the range beyond the 'radio horizon'. There are exceptions, which I will come to later on, but in general you will tend to find that the majority of signals you hear will be fairly local to your area – although I will explain how to gather in signals over the widest possible area.

2) Caution – know the legal position…

But before this, I would like to point out that as a scanner allows you to hear transmissions that are possibly of a sensitive nature, you would need to act responsibly. At the risk of sounding boring, you need to read this section. It could keep you out of real trouble!
Although it may come as a surprise early on, not every transmission available can be legally monitored. The legislation in different countries varies widely; some having few if any laws against scanning whereas in a few even mere ownership of a scanner is an imprisonable offence. In between, there are those, which place some restriction on what you can legally use your scanner for. As if this were not enough, sometimes the law is of considerable variance even within the same country. The classic example being the United States, where it may for example be perfectly legal to monitor the police department from your car in once state, but highly illegal in the next. Furthermore, some states place conditions on usage such as prohibiting use or installation in a motor vehicle. Some guidance on overseas travel is provided later on – but perhaps the best rule is: if in doubt, leave the scanner at home!

How about Britain? Well, the legislation to bear in mind is the Wireless Telegraphy Act, 1949 that regulates usage of the radio spectrum. This has always been geared toward regulation of transmitter usage rather than that of ownership of equipment; with certain exceptions, for example unapproved cordless telephones. Equipment capable only of reception (other than television sets!) is exempt from licensing in the United Kingdom – so mere possession of a scanner does not contravene the law in the UK, nor is there any regulation of what frequencies your scanner may cover. (Please note that this is not the case in every country, for example in the United States scanners may not be imported which cover the analogue cellular telephone frequencies, even though nowadays no analogue services are still provided!).

It is when you begin to use your scanner that you must take care, since in general section (5)(1)(b) of the wireless telegraphy act restricts listening to services deemed to be for 'general reception' by the public. Ofcom – The office of Communications – has an information sheet titled OFW156 (Guidance on Receive-Only Radio Scanners) available at the following location on the web:

Guidance on Receive-Only Radio Scanners

General reception

This sets out the legal position about the reception of personal or business radio transmissions by unauthorised persons or groups.

A licence is not required to use a radio receiver or scanner as long as it is not capable of transmission. It is not illegal to sell, buy or own a scanner or any other receiver but it must only be used to listen to transmissions meant for general reception. The services that can be listened to under the definition of general reception are:

a) licensed broadcasting stations
b) amateur and citizens' band radio transmissions
c) weather and navigation transmissions

It is an offence to listen to any other radio services unless licensed to do so, this includes listening to illegal radio stations (pirates) by virtue of the fact that they are not licensed radio stations.

Unauthorised reception

Section 5(1)(b) of the Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949 makes it an offence if a person "otherwise than under the authority of a designated person", either:

> "(i) uses any wireless telegraphy apparatus with intent to obtain information as to the contents, sender or addressee of any message whether sent by means of wireless telegraphy or not, of which neither the person using the apparatus nor a person on whose behalf he is acting is an intended recipient"

This means that it is illegal to listen to anything other than general reception transmissions unless you are either a licensed user of the frequencies in question or have been specifically authorised to do so by a designated person. A designated person means:

> a. the Secretary of State;
> b. the Commissioners of Customs and Excise; or > c. any other person designated for the purpose by regulations made by the Secretary of State.

or:

> (ii) except in the course of legal proceedings or for the purpose of any report thereof, discloses any information as to the contents, sender or addressee of any such message, being information which would not have come to his knowledge but for the use of wireless telegraphy apparatus by him or by another person."

This means that it is also illegal to tell a third party what has been heard.

With certain exceptions, it is an offence under Section 1 of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 for a person - "intentionally and without lawful authority to intercept, at any place in the United Kingdom, any communication in the course of its transmission by means of:

> a. a public postal service; or > b. a public telecommunication system."

It is similarly an offence to intercept any communication in the course of its transmission by means of a private telecommunication system. This means that it is illegal to listen to telephone calls, including mobile phone networks which are designated as forming part of the public telecommunications system.

Common questions answered

Question: Am I breaking the law by owning a scanner?

Answer: No, but it is illegal to use one to listen to frequencies other than general reception transmissions or those parts of the radio spectrum which your transmitting licence, if you have one, allows you to use. You could be prosecuted for this.

Question: Can I get a licence to use a scanner?

Answer: No, there is no scanner licence.

Question: Could I get authority to listen to emergency service transmissions, for example? I am interested and might be able to help.

Answer: No, authority is reserved for people acting under statutory authority. If you wish to listen in to messages, you should obtain the permission of the person sending them.

Question: Isn't it all right to listen as long as I don't pass on what I hear?

Answer: No, using radio equipment to listen in, except as provided by section 5(1)(b) of the WT Act, is an offence, regardless of whether the information is passed on.

Question: Isn't this all a bit heavy?

Answer: No. No one likes his or her private or business conversations to be listened to. Parliament has passed these laws to protect the privacy of radio users.

In practice, there are a number of grey areas as far as the practical application of the law is concerned, not least because the legislation dates back to 1949, whereas there are now a great many uses for the radio spectrum, many of which were not envisaged at the time. In general the authorities tend to be heaviest handed in regard to activities which can potentially aid and abet criminal activity, or which have the potential to endanger security. Also, illegal interception is likely to be regarded more seriously when it is intended to provide financial advantage.

It is a widely known fact that no licence is needed to receive radio broadcasts, and therefore all areas of the long wave, medium wave and FM broadcasting bands are open to us, as well as digital audio broadcasting and the interesting worldwide short-wave broadcasting bands which are open to us all. In much the same way, the citizens' band (CB) and all of the amateur bands may be legally and safely monitored. To this can be added "standard frequency and time" transmissions used for the calibration of equipment, and navigation transmissions. But any listening beyond this, with the exception of frequencies for which the individual or organisation holds a licence to transmit, is likely to be illegal. But it would seem that there is some amount of tolerance – go to any air display whether at a civil or military field, and you will see a proliferation of receivers ranging from simple ones costing a few pounds, to the high end scanners costing hundreds of pounds. In fact, at many displays personnel even write on a blackboard the frequencies in use by the pilots – effectively granting permission to listen! The official position here is that sailors holding a marine licence are free to monitor the marine bands in their free time if they wish, and pilots may do so on the civil aviation band. But even if you don't have a valid licence, no one is likely to prosecute you for listening to marine or civil aviation traffic.
In fact at an air display one may even see others listening to the military traffic in the UHF military aviation band. It would seem that insofar as the personal at the event are satisfied with the situation, one need not be overly concerned. Common sense would dictate that of course standing near the perimeter fence with a scanner during normal military operations is likely to land you in trouble!

Although less interesting to most people, it would seem that the majority of the public would 'turn a blind eye' to the monitoring of PBR (business) frequencies, except where a competitor did so to gain unfair business advantage (for example, a taxi firm monitoring it's competitors to steal customers). The authorities have indeed prosecuted both companies and individuals for conduct such as this.

And then there are finally, of course, definite 'no go' areas such as the police, military and cordless telephones, the monitoring of which is certainly seen as unacceptable by the authorities. Although in practice it is very difficult to police what one listens to in private, it is worth keeping in mind that you need not be caught in the act to be prosecuted; – simply having private frequencies stored in the scanners' memory is considered proof of interception. In particular, people were often prosecuted for listening to police transmissions, although the encrypted airwave system has more recently rendered this impossible. Store sensitive frequencies in your head alone.

So, the best advice is not to break the law unless you are prepared to risk the consequences. Scanning simply in pursuit of a hobby is possible through care and discretion, but keep in mind that you will hear more if your scanner is not confiscated, and you will afford more equipment if you are not fined! So although you may personally feel that scanning is a truly victimless crime, if ever there were such a thing, keep in this mind – a crime it can be!

3) Getting Started – or, you get what you pay for!

So now for your first scanner – and the other items you will need to get the best use out of it. What features would, could or should your best choice of scanner have? Or, one question I am often asked is: what's the best scanner? Well all I can say is that there's really not such a single answer! Do you mean best as in value for money? Best as in it's ease of use? Best in terms of it's features or performance?

An inevitable starting point obviously concerns your budget. What does a 'top of the range' scanner have which a basic scanner costing less than £100 when new doesn't? This question will need to be answered in stages, since there are a great many points to consider. But first of all – what will you be listening to, how, where and when?

Remember, it's all too easy as a beginner to opt for the cheapest option. But only when you put such a scanner into serious use will you truly discover its shortcomings. Other than in terms of the features, which I'll discuss shortly, the essential characteristics are sensitivity, selectivity, and 'image rejection'. In short, sensitivity refers to the receiver's ability to hear weak signals. Noise is generated in all electronic circuitry, without exception, but the lower the noise level the more sensitive the receiver will be. This is quoted in terms of signal to noise ratio (for FM), a good figure to look for is 10dB S/N ratio at 0.5µV for narrowband FM of 3.5KHz deviation. This figure is invariably higher for WFM. In the case of AM, the measure is quoted in terms of the modulation level and signal strength, for 10dB S/N ratio at 0.5 µV or less for 30% deviation is reasonable.
Selectivity refers to the ability of your scanner to hear a (possibly weak) signal on one frequency without it being obliterated by a very much stronger signal on a frequency close by. An attenuation of 6dB for 12KHz and 60dB at 30 KHz separation from the wanted signal is quite good for NFM or AM modes, for CW or SSB I would say 6dB at 1.8KHz is generally good. For WFM, 6dB at 150KHz is reasonable.

Image rejection is best explained in this manner. All scanners have internal oscillators, which are a building block in their circuitry. An internal oscillator has a particular frequency, 10.7MHz being an example. This inevitably leads to the production of image frequencies within the circuitry. A common example being the true carrier frequency plus or minus twice an I.F frequency. For example, the first scanner I owned received an airbase frequency of 411.725 MHz when actually tuned to 433.125, which was a nuisance when listening to the local amateur repeater.
Another aspect of internal oscillators worthy of some discussion here concerns the effect of signals from local oscillators combining. The choice of I.F frequency influences the sensitivity and selectivity, and the requirements conflict. Therefore most receivers nowadays use multiple I.F frequencies; most are triple heterodyne – they have three I.F frequencies. So, not only do these I.F frequencies mix together, but these also have harmonics, which likewise mix together! So several internal oscillators can produce a number of 'birdies', which will cause the scanner to find what appears to be an unmodulated carrier. If this remains after you remove the aerial, a 'birdie' is the culprit. Fortunately, the odds are against a birdie corresponding with a frequency you monitor in your area. But they are still a headache when it comes to searching, particularly when covering a large expanse of spectrum such as the military aviation band, where you are likely to encounter a number of these which will halt the search (and, if you have an automatic write feature in use, add these to the memories stored!).

Whatever salesmen may tell you; you do not need the 'latest and greatest' scanner if you just wish to keep an ear out on a handful of marine channels or amateur repeaters in your area. Remember, their job is to maximise sales, yours is to get the scanner most suited to your needs. On the other hand, if you decide to go for the top of the range right away, in the belief that you'll 'decide what I enjoy later' the chances are you'll 'waste' a lot of money on a scanner with many specialised features you'll rarely use if at all. So rather than discuss particular models (except for a few examples), I'll discuss the features and functions available (ignoring obvious ones such as your volume control), and explain their purpose and when they will come in useful.

Keep in mind that you are best advised to turn to stores which specialise in radio and communications – these are generally staffed by enthusiasts such as radio amateurs who will have knowledge and experience to offer, unlike say hi-fi or television dealers who may, say, sell a couple of models of scanner in a quiet corner of the store. This way you should avoid disappointment.

Frequency coverage

This is the very first – and probably most crucial - single aspect to consider since it determines what you can monitor – and what you cannot! There are two broad types of scanner – banded and continuous coverage.
Banded scanners cover only particular frequency ranges of interest to particular users. These are fine for those who know what they wish to monitor, and that the scanner covers the frequencies in question, and used to be cheaper than general coverage scanners. I say used to, since these days general coverage scanners have come down in price. For example, in 2000, when I bought my Icom IC-R2 for £150, its 0.495 to 1310MHz coverage had previously only been available on 'top of the range' models, most of which were base scanners.

In particular there are dedicated civil air band scanners, which cater for those who listen for their interest in aircraft rather than in scanning (although it is of great interest to 'general' scanner enthusiasts also). In essence, these provide the air enthusiast with excellent performance at a very good price. The civil aviation service uses AM exclusively, and the ideal circuitry for AM is different for that for FM. As the air enthusiast does not need FM circuitry, it's inclusion would mean paying for something they never use.
For the general scanner listener, there are banded scanners which attempt to compromise between price and coverage by covering only bands of specific interest in a given country – in particular the US market. However these can later disappoint as I know from experience, as sooner or later a desire may arise to monitor a frequency which lies just outside of it's coverage! A good way to explain this is by an example. A simple scanner I once owned had the following coverage:

Band	Frequency Range
VHF Low (US Version)	29-54 MHz
VHF Low (European Version)	66-88 MHz
VHF High	136-174 MHz
UHF	406-512 MHz
UHF Cellular	806 – 960 MHz

Although this seems adequate maybe to a beginner, I'll explain the shortcomings in terms of UK frequency allocations.

The US VHF low band covers less than half the 10-meter amateur band, the six-meter amateur band, cordless telephones and a few other items. If you have the European version, it covers the for the 4 meter amateur band instead of six meters and VHF low PBR - (But could not monitor the fire service at 70MHz as it had only narrowband FM mode, see later). Indeed if the scanner you chose was available with either the US or European low band coverage but not both, you would have to decide whether you wanted, say, to monitor PMR or cordless phones.
There's no air band coverage (civil or military), and although the VHF high band covers the two-meter amateur band and the PBR high band in the UK it does not cover television band three which in the UK is not used for television but for trunked PBR systems as well as some low power devices such as radio microphones.
The UHF band covers the 70cm amateur band and UHF PBR, as well as running into the television frequencies (which are wideband, and this scanner does not have wideband FM; very useful!).
The UHF cellular band might have been useful once, but now all mobile phones are digital, not any longer. It is true that there are cordless headphones in this range, as well as wireless microphones and links, but these use wideband FM and without this mode the coverage above 470MHz is effectively wasted, unless you are interested in the 23 and 13cm amateur bands or satellite reception, for example Metosat that transmits on 1691 and 1694.5 MHz. In this case, the 960MHz limit renders these impossible to monitor anyway.
So given that nowadays continuous coverage scanners are not that much more expensive than banded scanners, I would recommend opting for a general coverage scanner, and avoiding later disappointment. Trust me.

A good specification would be 25 to 1300 MHz with at least AM, FM/NFM & WFM modes (more explanation of modes in a moment). This should cover just about everything you are likely to want to receive using a scanner in the United Kingdom. In fact for a very long time 1300 MHz was pretty much the standard upper frequency limit for the vast majority of scanners, due to there being little of practical interest immediately above this frequency. Although there are some services, which can be monitored, this is a specialised are of monitoring for several reasons. For one, signals at such high frequencies running into GHz are strictly 'line of sight' – and I know this definition is used even with regard to VHF, but it's a very much stricter definition here. To monitor here you need to be either very close to the signal source, or (for omni directional transmissions, very high up and 'in the clear'), for directional transmissions, 'in the beam' in the sense that high gain, low beam width make the chances of interception unlikely.
For another, most of the transmissions are digital and are often encrypted (more on this subject later on). And thirdly, it gets very expensive to monitor transmissions in the GHz area since the aerials and co-axial cable you need (again, I'll discuss this later on) can cost quite a few pounds per metre as cheap cable will be of very high loss even over relatively short distances!

How about below 25MHz? Well, none of the above applies here; indeed the problems are very different. On the 'high frequency' bands which are considered to extend from 3MHz to 30MHz, it's reasonably easy to receive signals in a sense, so much so that although your scanner using a short whip or 'rubber duck' aerial with which it is supplied will receive a few very strong signals, when you connect it up to the resonant (or nearer resonant) wire dipoles which are needed to receive the majority of signals present in this part of the spectrum, the very strong broadcast signals will overload the circuitry in most scanners. You'll get some interesting broadcasts from around the world if the aerial allows just enough broadcast signal to reach the circuitry without overloading, but to be truthful almost all (even amateur) speech transmissions on HF use SSB (single side band) mode and unless your scanner does feature this mode, you won't be able to resolve the transmissions. Further to this, the filtering on a scanner is really designed for VHF or UHF where the minimum channel spacing (using narrowband FM) is 10KHz in the US and 12.5 KHz here in Europe, rather than the 5KHz for HF broadcasting (let alone narrower spacings used elsewhere), so if for example there is a strong broadcast station on 7.250 MHz you will hear it when tuned to 7.245 or 7.255 MHz as well.
So in essence, if say 60% of your interest in radio lies in short-wave and 40% in VHF/UHF, I'd spend say 70% of my budget on a dedicated short-wave receiver and the remainder on a scanner for higher frequencies. Simply put, for real performance on HF on your scanner you will need to spend several hundred pounds. Those scanners, which really do perform well on HF, are nearly all base scanners, such as the Icom IC-8500 below. This will certainly set you back well over a thousand pounds however! Generally, I would say that a pound spent on HF on a dedicated HF receiver is worth five or ten spent on HF coverage on a scanner, which really is just an optional extra in any event.

If you really do want a solid performance HF receiver and VHF/UHF scanning receiver in one, then two very good choices, which I can recommend are the Icom IC-8500 (above), and the Fairhaven RD-500VX. These are the best performers I have as of yet encountered, besides their offering in performance terms, they also have an impressive range of features to offer.

If your pockets are deep indeed, and you insist on the very best receiver you can get hold of, then maybe the Icom IC-R9500 shown below, and which is available from Radioworld at time of writing for a hefty £8899.95 would meet your requirements. This features a seven-inch LCD display, voice synthesiser, a 'multi function spectrum scope' (giving it the functions of a spectrum analyser!), and digital signal processing. Coverage is from 5KHz (VLF) to 3.335 GHz (SHF), so you won't be missing much!

It goes without mentioning that these radios will take time to master, I would expect to keep the manual close at hand for a few weeks after purchase. So very definitely not good choices for a beginner, these are for seasoned enthusiasts. Also, be prepared to save your pennies for a while prior to purchase.

Receive modes

So now I have referred to modes several times already, what are they? Well this is to do with the way that the pure radio frequency carrier is varied or modulated to carry voice or other information.
Firstly, there's amplitude modulation, AM. This implies the power of the carrier being varied with the audio volume. This is used by familiar medium and long wave broadcasting, along with worldwide short-wave broadcasting, and aviation communications. In the case of aviation, this is because where two signals of differing strengths are received at once, both can be heard, unlike in the case of FM, where the stronger signal alone is heard –the weaker signal is rejected. Also, AM can be transmitted at multiple sites by synchronised transmitters whose coverage areas overlap, whereas FM cannot. This is largely why the police and fire services in the UK chose AM over FM in years gone by. So to monitor these services, you will need AM mode.

Narrowband FM, referred to in most scanner manuals as NFM, is the standard mode used by the majority of VHF and UHF communications. Away from the places mentioned above, NFM is by far the commonest mode in use. In fact away from the amateur bands, it's almost exclusively used by communications. So all scanners except air band only scanners will have this mode as standard. By narrowband, I mean that the frequency of then carrier changes by around 3-5 KHz allowing the frequencies composing a human voice to be conveyed – a similar 'bandwidth' to that of a telephone line, which is known as the commercial speech bandwidth.
On the other hand, broadcasting uses wideband FM, or WFM mode. Here the deviation of the carrier can be 50-100 KHz, allowing the full audio range to be conveyed. Therefore, the higher frequency components of music can be accommodated. This mode is used by FM broadcasting (your familiar 88-108 MHz FM dial!), and television audio in most countries - France being a noteworthy exception where TV audio uses AM. Note that the mathematical relationship between bandwidth and sensitivity (lack of receiver 'noise') means that unfortunately scanners cannot be as sensitive on WFM mode. WFM signals received in NFM mode will be very distorted to the point of being useless, whereas on WFM mode the receive bandwidth covers several NFM channels, so that on say 453.075 MHz in WFM mode you would also hear transmissions on 453.05 and 453.1 MHz at once!

Single sideband or SSB is only ever encountered on amateur bands on VHF or UHF, and not that often here (try listening under good DX conditions, or when there is a contest taking place for best chances of hearing SSB). So if your scanner does not cover HF frequencies below 25-30 MHz, it really is an optional extra and certainly not a perquisite. On HF, all voice transmissions other than broadcast stations and, except on rare occasions, amateur transmissions use SSB.
This is more efficient than AM or FM because it uses less bandwidth (or simply put, allows more stations to occupy a given amount of 'space on the dial' than for AM or FM). The downside being that special circuitry is required to resolve it, without which you cannot decipher the voice or data. For the technically minded, since a modulated AM carrier contains the pure carrier (carrying no information in itself), and an upper and lower sideband, of which both 'sidebands' are essentially a mirror image of each other, for greater efficiency the carrier is removed along with on of the sidebands. Therefore SSB comes in two variants, upper and lower sideband, USB and LSB.

Incidentally, if you are not able to tune a station, it's probably using the other sideband! Since SSB is so narrowband, you will need smaller frequency steps than the 5KHz minimum step size offered on VHF – in fact 1KHz and 0.1KHz, perhaps 0.01 KHz will be needed. Note that instead of small frequency steps many receivers limit you to 1, 3, or 5KHz steps, but provide a 'fine tuning' control to adjust the actual tuned frequency above or below the nearest tuning step. This works in the sense that it permits you to listen to the transmission, but it does not permit you to accurately store a SSB channel in memory. It does however provide a quick and convenient way to correct for the Doppler effect, which shifts the received frequency of signals received from orbiting satellites, which is a consequence of their motion relative to the receiving station. Best of all for dealing with Doppler shifting is an automatic frequency control, discussed later. Note that you can practice tuning in a SSB channel if you go to a frequency carrying continuous transmission, for example 5.050 MHz (USB mode) which carries the RAF volmet.

Finally, CW or constant wave is the most basic form of communication and operates by simply keying the carrier on and off. The sound of this is familiar to some as: Morse code. This is a specialised form of communication nowadays, and yet is still the mode of choice for radio amateurs in contests as it is possible to read the transmission below the noise level. You will need to learn Morse code for this mode to be of use. Nowadays, commercial, marine and military use has ceased, except for some beacons, which identify themselves using Morse. But it is widely used on amateur bands on HF and occasionally on amateur bands on VHF or UHF.

Insofar as scanner enthusiasts are concerned, the essential modes are NFM for the majority of VHF and UHF communications, with AM for aviation and broadcasts on HF and below (if your scanner tunes below 25MHz), and WFM is nice to have since although it's not what one buys a scanner for, it is useful occasionally to be able to tune into FM broadcast or TV audio without needing a separate radio with you. Some broadcasting links and wireless microphones also use WFM, and can be found in various places on VHF and UHF, including in the television broadcast band. SSB and CW are really for the most serious scanner enthusiasts or radio amateurs.

Tuning step sizes

Scanners do not tune in a constant manner as, for example, your standard medium wave radio does. Rather, it does so in a series of discrete steps. It is important to remember that in fact all transmissions (with just a single exception), take place on previously agreed spot frequencies. For example, on the FM broadcast dial all stations are all spaced multiples of 100KHz, although multiples of 50KHz are used in some countries. This planning is intended to avoid interference between adjacent channels. The only exception is that radio amateurs are not obliged to do so given that they keep within allocated bands. In practice, they do still choose to do so since this not only allows incompatible modes to be kept apart, but commercial equipment comes equipped with standard channel spacings anyhow.

In the UK, 12.5 KHz is by far the commonest spacing for communications, although some exceptions do exist. Although the civil aviation band once employed 25KHz steps, 8 1/3 KHz steps (1/3 of 25KHz) have now been adopted, permitting more efficient use of bandwidth whilst allowing the original allocated frequencies to remain unchanged. At present, not all available scanners provide the 8 1/3 KHz steps, so it is necessary to select the steps size allowing one to get as close as possible. In practice, a very small error is not too drastic.

Here are the step sizes used by various services. Note that not all sizes are used in the UK, but are in use in other countries.

Step Size (KHz)	Service Examples
0.01	Used to accurately tune SSB & CW
0.1	SSB & CW tuning
1	SSB 'Course Tuning' and HF services
5	HF Broadcast and some US services
6.25	Cordless phones, telemetry & PMR446*
8.33333	Civil Aviation
10	6m Amateur Band, CB & most US services
12.5	Most UK services except otherwise shown
15	Baby monitors (some exceptions)
20	Some US services, not used in UK
25	Marine, some data and cordless microphones
30	US analogue cellular (being phased out) – not UK
50	Some countries – FM Broadcast; not UK
100	FM broadcast and WFM cordless microphones
8000	Broadcast television channels 21-68

*Note that some services use 12.5 KHz spacing but with a 6.25 KHz offset. 6.25 KHz steps can be used to accurately tune these. Otherwise, 5KHz steps will 'get you close enough' to monitor, whereas 12.5KHz steps alone will appear halfway between channels, making monitoring difficult or even impossible. The most essential sizes in the UK are 5, 12.5 and 100Khz whereas other sizes are useful to have. For example, 12.5 KHz caters for 25KHz spacing, but half of the tuning steps are of no use. This results in a slower than optimal search rate. Incidentally, as I'm a perfectionist I do wish that where 6.25 KHz tuning steps are provided, the designers would provide 5 decimal places for 'correct' display of the frequency. I know that to display 446.0062 instead of 446.00625 only represents an error of 50Hz, but to me, a frequency is either right or it's wrong! One does have to accept though that 8 1/3 KHz steps will inevitably be rounded off as 1/3 cannot be represented by a set number of decimal places! SSB and CW signals require very accurate tuning due to their very narrow bandwidth, hence the 0.1 and 0.01 KHz steps provided on high end receivers such as the Icom IC-R20.

Number of Memory Channels

Once you have searched for frequencies in use in your area, you will want to store them to scan in future. Some early scanners allowed only ten frequencies to be stored; nowadays scanners have anything up to a thousand or more. This may seem to be overkill at first, but trust me, it's better not to assume a certain number (say 200) is adequate only to find that a couple of weeks after buying your scanner you have filled them all! I must stress that even ten channels is adequate for someone who would like to 'keep an ear out' on a handful of marine channels, for example. Generally, cheaper scanners will tend to have fewer memory channels available.
On this subject, some scanners allow these to be programmed using a PC via a USB or serial cable. Not only does this save a great deal of time, it also means that you have a limitless number of memories available over and above those your scanner provides itself. Also, you can have a configuration file for different parts of the country, or different uses for your scanner.

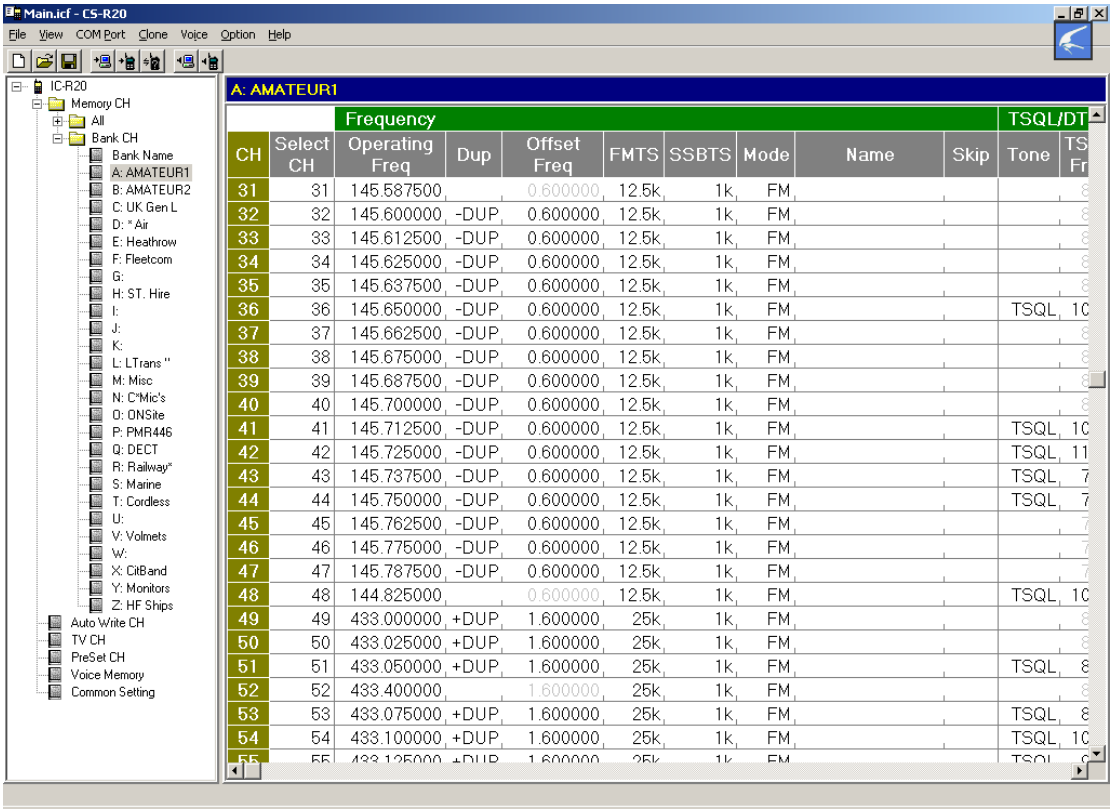
The Icom IC-R20 (left) is an example of such a scanner. Icom have long had a policy of providing PC programming capability. Given that many of their radios feature alpha tagging and many other features which are tedious and time consuming to program directly into the scanner (in the extreme!), as well as rather error prone, this is just as well. Another very good reason for considering a radio with this capability is that you have a backup available should you need to 'hard' reset the scanner for any reason.

Indeed Icom equipment sells on features and performance rather than ease of use.

The CS-R20 programming software is shown below. As well as memory programming and cloning, this also allows voice recordings made with the built-in digital voice recorder to be saved to the computer for future usage – although it does not permit them to be played on the PC; rather one must either reload it to the IC-R20 or alternatively you must use a third party program to convert them to the standard wave (.wav) format.



Some discussion regarding cloning software is certainly in order here. It's a sad fact that much of the software for programming these radios is a real pain to use, to put it mildly! Sadly, the CS-R20 programming software shown is typical of most software, which exists for programming radios. You cannot copy and paste even single (let alone multiple!) entries, you have to enter each and every one individually. The now standard Ctrl-C, Ctrl-V and Ctrl-Z shortcuts do nothing. Nothing at all! OK, this beats doing it all using the radio's keypad or dial, but it is still tedious in the extreme! CS-R20 does not even permit you to import or export data from 'universal' file formats, for example .CSV (comma separated values) files, as do many third party utilities for programming other radios. It's no good trying to edit the configuration files (.ICF in the case of Icom cloning software), since the files are not plain ASCII files as, say, Windows .INI files are, but rather everything is stored as hexadecimal values, which are incomprehensible to all of us other than Icom firmware developers. Furthermore, even where the software does allow data import from other file formats, it is very limited in scope, and in some cases, when you read in the data the program often insists on reapplying the default values it 'knows' about. For example, the Alinco DJX3 clone utility, shown below, often insists on defaulting to 20kHz steps in UHF ranges such as the 23cm amateur band. Now I know that this is the typical channel spacing in the US, but (sigh) I don't live in the US! If I stipulate 25kHz steps in the .CSV file I want to use 25kHz steps! I really don't want to have to manually reset each and every memory back to what I asked for in the first place. Often, there is no way to change the mode, step size, CTCSS tone or other parameters for multiple entries, again it has to be done on a per entry basis. This quickly gets tedious when you have several hundred entries. It's great to have a radio which can store over 1000 memories, but in this case, you would expect that more thought would go into the cloning software which is meant to make the programming easier!

I must stress that any means of importing data from elsewhere is better than none at all, but why is the software so un-user friendly? Part of the trouble is that those who write the software are not particularly fluent with PC programming; they specialise in developing the firmware for the radio itself. Of course, I'm not only thinking of scanners or even amateur transceivers here; the same has always been true of PMR equipment also, I speak as someone who has reprogrammed PMR equipment for use on the respective amateur bands.

If you have any option, you are best advised to opt for third party software (for example, Jim Mitchell's IC-R2 Commander) as opposed to Icom's own offering for programming the IC-R2, to name but one example. What's more, many of these third party programs are available as shareware or freeware, which is more than can be said for many of the manufacturer's own utilities.

As an endnote for this particular topic, why is so little software available for other operating systems such as Linux or Macintosh? Hats off to the third parties who produce what little is available.

Dynamic Memory Banks

Although when you start out, a scanner having 1000 memories may seem future proof enough, if you will be surprised how quickly you run into memory management problems - unless you live out in the sticks and have few channels to program!
The Icom IC-R20 is the only radio I have so far owned to feature dynamic memory banks. Each of the 1000 regular memories can be assigned to one of up to 26 banks (named from A through to Z in the IC-R20's case), which allows for much greater flexibility and efficiency when it comes to memory management. Many of the recent Uniden models, including the recent UBC3500XLT, which has 2500 memories available (which even I would not as yet be able to fill!), also have this feature, which looks set to feature on more and more scanners, and will hopefully, a few years down the line, become standard on all but the cheapest or simplest scanners. No longer will you be forced to either use memories wastefully or group dissimilar users in the same bank. What I am referring to here is that, using the Realistic Pro-2042 as an example, if your scanner has ten banks of 100 channels, making 1000 in all, and you happen to have, say, 72 civil airband frequencies and 43 military airband frequencies which you wish to monitor, you will no longer be forced to either: 1) Place your military and civil frequencies in separate banks, leaving 28 wasted channels in the civil airband bank and 57 wasted channels in the military airband bank, or 2) mix civil and military frequencies to fill one bank, leaving 15 frequencies in a second bank mixed with another type of user.

Dynamic memory management solves this problem simply by allowing you the flexibility to choose which bank a given memory should be assigned to! This allows you to have either as many or as few memories in a bank as you like, with no wasted memories. In the above example, you can simply assign 72 memories to your civil airband bank in order to hold your 72 civil airband frequencies, and 43 memories to your military airband bank, to hold your 43 military airband frequencies. Memories not assigned to a bank remain free to be assigned to any bank. It is also possible to remove a memory from a bank to be reassigned to another! Note that dynamic memory management comes at something of a price; the increased complexity of the programming required. It is well worth noting that dynamic memory scanner programming is much easier to accomplish using a PC, since not only do you have the benefit of a full size keyboard, but also you can fully visualise your memory mapping on a PC display. The programming software and interface cable will be well worth the investment!

However your memory banks are arranged, programming them sequentially, in order of either ascending or descending frequency can pay dividends. Your scanner will always scan most efficiently, and hence quickly, when the frequencies are in order. Indeed, if you do not have available a means by which to program your scanner using a PC, and cannot take advantage of the flexibility it offers, you might be best advised to program only either even or odd memory channel numbers in order of either ascending or descending frequency in each bank, leaving the memory channels in between unused when you program it for the first time. Why? Well, as you will soon discover, even for en experienced enthusiast programming the scanner is a tedious, time consuming and error prone process. Leaving every other memory channel vacant means that frequencies can be changed or corrected, or new ones can be added later, whilst keeping them in sequence, without having to re-program the entire bank! I know that when you have just bought your new scanner (possibly your first one) and you want to get out a reference book and start shoving the frequencies into your scanner so as to be up and running as soon as possible. I've been there of course. But if you take my advice here, you'll thank me later! Of course this strategy only works if you have plenty of memory channels available compared with the number of frequencies to be stored.

Base, portable or computer based?

Scanners come in three basic flavours, base, handheld and computer based. Base scanners generally offer the best performance in terms of their filtering (see selectivity and image rejection above), and are convenient to operate when sat at a desk in your shack or from the comfort of a nearby armchair. Also, since they are primarily designed for use with a high-gain, well-sited base aerial they are less prone to overloading than their handheld counterparts. But unless it can be powered from 12 volts in your car, or from another 12 volt battery such as the lead/acid ones which provide emergency lighting, you are permanently dependent on mains power and cannot use it during a power failure during severe weather – an example of an occasion on which it is potentially of a great deal of use.

Handheld scanners on the other hand are very compact and operate from batteries. Some such as the IC-R2 shown are about the size of a credit card, in spite of this they may have a surprising number of features. These are a must-have if you want to take a scanner with you to an air display, or while walking the dog. However, they are designed to accommodate weaker signals from a telescopic or 'rubber duck' type aerial and often overload when connected to a base aerial system.

Also, the controls are somewhat awkward for extended use given their small size. Yet another drawback is that while the audio is more than adequate for headphone use or in a quiet environment, you will struggle to hear much in a car unless you feed it into your car stereo for amplification (If your sound system lacks an auxiliary input socket, then you can get adapters which fit into the cassette compartment and which input audio via the tape playback head).

Clearly, for safety reasons it's best to adjust the scanner only when the vehicle is stationary – don't let it be a distraction whilst behind the wheel!

Nowadays, there is a third alternative to base or handheld scanners in the form of computer-based receivers. These can be either internal, as in the example below, or external, next image below.

The WinRadio suite comprises of a number of software controlled receivers, including a short-wave radio, a scanning receiver and some optional components, which even decode data modes including MPT1327 trunked network control channels. A Linux version called LinRadio is also available. These can be downloaded and used in a demonstration mode without the hardware so you may explore their features. These features are often impressive to say the least! As indeed the WR-G33WSM user interface demonstrates. Indeed it is just like having a 'top of the range' scanner, spectrum analyser (which can be linear or logarithmic) and audio analyser/recorder rolled into one! Add to this the fact that you will no longer have to add a new circuit board to your scanner to cater for new modulation or encoding schemes (or even have to buy a new scanner which has this functionality built in), since such functionality can be added simply by updating the software or drivers, and you can begin to visualise just how powerful a tool software defined radio can truly be.

Although very versatile in the sense that the powerful PC processor can be utilised to decode transmissions, and that the only limitation of the number of memory channels available is the size of the hard disk(!), there are inevitably drawbacks. Firstly, computer circuitry generates all manner of interfering signals across large portions of the radio spectrum (Don't believe me? Stand your handheld next to your PC and try a search!), so the receiver and aerial system must be adequately screened. Also, you cannot use the receiver as a standalone receiver, i.e. without the PC. So unless you have a strong, compelling reason to buy such a receiver, you are best opting for either a portable or base unit, preferably one that can interface with a computer as and when needed, just as I mentioned earlier. Having an external receiver you can connect to your laptop for use on those business trips may indeed be such an excuse. Of course, if you are a radio engineer in any sense, software defined radio offers diagnostic capability which is second to none.

Amateur Transceivers with Expanded Frequency Coverage

Not strictly scanners in their own right, but worthy of some discussion since these have many of the functions of a scanner. Nowadays a majority of amateur transceivers, operating on one or more of the VHF/UHF amateur bands between 6 metres (50MHz) and 23 centimetres (1240MHz) have expanded receiving frequency ranges, allowing a useful amount of monitoring to be carried out outside amateur bands. Although they lack the full range of features of a dedicated scanning receiver, many do boast acceptable scanning speeds and have at least some of the facilities offered by your typical scanner. For example, the Icom IC-E7 is roughly the same size of the IC-R2 scanning receiver, and has 1000 memory channels and also 250 automatic write channels, as many Icom Scanners have. It has AM, NFM and WFM receive modes, and covers 495 kHz to 999.9875 MHz. It's transmitting ranges are 144-146MHz (2 metres) and 430-440MHz (70 centimetres), NFM only. The IC-E7 is shown using the supplied aerial (right) and a low profile Diamond SH3 'low profile' aerial which is good for discrete usage (left). The matchbox next to the image on the right gives you an idea of size. The IC-E7 saves me having to carry two radios around with me. Needless to say, this is only of benefit to radio amateurs since you need to be a licenced radio amateur to use the IC-E7 as a transmitter!

Also, unlike most amateur handhelds, the IC-E7 doesn't look (and feel) like a 1980's mobile phone when you take it out and about. But as this radio is too small to accept AA or even AAA batteries, so it uses a 1800 mA/Hour lithium/Ion pack. Which brings me onto the very important subject of batteries and power.

The Icom IC-E7.

Battery Considerations

Although power is rather an obvious, even trivial requirement in itself, the means by which a handheld scanner is powered is worth thinking about. After all, your scanner is useless if you have turned up at an event you have been looking forward to for ages, only to find the batteries are well and truly flat!
For handheld scanners, the available options concerning batteries are a vital consideration. So much so that I would not buy a radio, which could only run on 'throw away' batteries, if such a radio existed. Nearly all handhelds accept standard AA size batteries, and rechargeable Nichol metal hydride batteries now come in 2AH capacity. So even if your handheld takes 200 mA when the squelch is open, they should theoretically last for ten hours. In practice, they only need to last for a day's usage, so this is plenty. Unlike the nickel cadmium cells which I have gradually phased out in favour of NI-MH, these cells do not suffer from memory effect, so do not appear to have discharged when in fact there is power remaining. However, they do self-discharge over a period of a few weeks, so it's well worth charging them just before use, rather than well in advance. It's well worth having two sets so you can immediately replace the flat cells, even during an air display should the need arise.
If you are reckoning on using throwaway cells, and use your handheld most days, you may soon find that you very soon will easily spend as much on batteries as you did on your scanner!
Some scanners such as the Icom IC-R20 come with a lithium-ion pack. These pack a great deal of power into a relatively small amount of space (the R20 regularly gives 20-30 hours use on a single charge). It is worth checking whether you can use regular rechargables should the need arise however.
It is best if possible to use rechargables fully (until the low battery indication appears) since they deliver the longest possible life if fully used and then fully recharged. Using some power then topping up wears them out more quickly. Also, avoid overcharging (the scanner or charger manual will tell you whether there is a cut-off to avoid overcharging, if not you will need to remember to turn of the power when they have charged fully. Also, don't allow the batteries to over-discharge; turn off or replace with your spare set when the final low battery indication appears.
Many scanners do allow for in-situ charging, which avoids the hassle of removing batteries for charging, with the subsequent wear and tear that this involves. Note that many radios come with proprietary battery packs, it is worth keeping in mind that these are very much a 'captive market' and when they eventually wear out and cease to hold a charge will cost you considerably more to replace than standard rechargeable AA cells. Having said that, lithium-ion packs do store a good amount of capacity in a small space; they have a high power to weight ratio.
Finally, most receivers have an automatic power off feature, which will automatically turn off the radio after a selectable period without any use of the controls. This will obviously save you forgetting to switch it off, and then stumbling across a dead radio later on. Also many radios (almost all these days) have a power save option which extends battery life by turning off the circuitry for a given percentage of the time – you will normally leave this on all the time unless fast response is needed as is the case for the decoding of date modes.

*Key lo*ck
This provides an effective way to prevent accidental operation of controls whilst you search for things in your pocket, or as you move around. Normally disables all controls except the basics such as the volume control. Hint: if for some reason your scanner stops responding to the use of controls, check to see if you have the key lock engaged.

Offset Monitor

Some receivers such as those by Icom allow a control (such as the function or squelch control to retune the radio by a preset amount. For example, in the 70cm amateur band, mobiles transmit 1.6MHz higher in frequency than the repeater outputs. The offset monitor allows you to quickly check to see if the mobile station can be heard at your location. Very useful when monitoring users operating in half duplex when talk through facility is switched off.

Automatic memory write/store

Imagine you are in an area of low radio usage such as a rural area where usage levels are low. This saves you having to manually search and store frequencies found in use. You can set the scanner to search between two frequencies of your choice and leave it when you go to work. Now you can return to a list of frequencies used at some point during the day! One feature, which I wonder how, I ever managed without.

Squelch Options

As communications transmissions are intermittent, all scanners have at least a basic squelch, which cuts off the audio in the absence of a signal, and allows the scanner to resume scanning or searching. Additionally most scanners also provide CTCSS (control tone coded squelch system), which, if the transmission in question carries the correct tone, allows the scanner to open squelch only on receipt of the correct tone. This allows you to monitor one user of a shared system such as a CBS (common base station) whilst filtering out those you find boring. Also some amateur repeaters do not transmit their CTCSS tone when they identify themselves, so if monitoring for an extended period of time you can filter out the annoying idents. Likewise, this can also allows signals such as birdies, computer hash and images to be screened out, given that the user of the frequency in question uses CTCSS. CTCSS tones sound to the listener as a constant, low frequency tone, which is audible through a hi-fi speaker or headphones and lasts for the duration of a transmission.

DCS or digitally coded squelch is, so far, comparatively rare in the UK, but it allows you to set your scanner to open squelch only on receipt of the correct digital code – assuming that the user of the frequency uses DCS. This is an alternative to CTCSS although it does the same job. Scanners supporting CTCSS or DCS normally allow you to scan for the correct tone or DCS code in use by the user of the frequency. DCS sounds to the listener as a less regular tone which sounds rather like a rasp – it is not as smooth as CTCSS.

Audio squelch or voice coded squelch allows the squelch to open only if a signal has modulation. This is helpful when searching a band containing one or more ‘birdies’ or other unmodulated signals, which would normally prevent the scanner from resuming its search. Indeed, although CTCSS and DCS (and to a lesser extent, voice squelch) capabilities are normally thought of in terms of their ability to avoid hearing unwanted transmissions on shared frequencies, in my view their ability to help reject birdies, inter-modulation products and images, as well as random interference from other electronic devices is just about as important.

Finally, some systems send short data bursts using FSK (Frequency Shift Keying). These sound like short, harsh, occasional electronic tones which are often sent at the start of transmission. They are often used in a selective calling scheme, as used by CARPS (Computer Aided Radio Personal System) Controller from Purcell Radio Systems, which is mentioned elsewhere.

Mode scan/search

A small number of scanners allow you to search a band for a particular mode such as AM or FM. Rarely encountered and of very limited usefulness in any case.

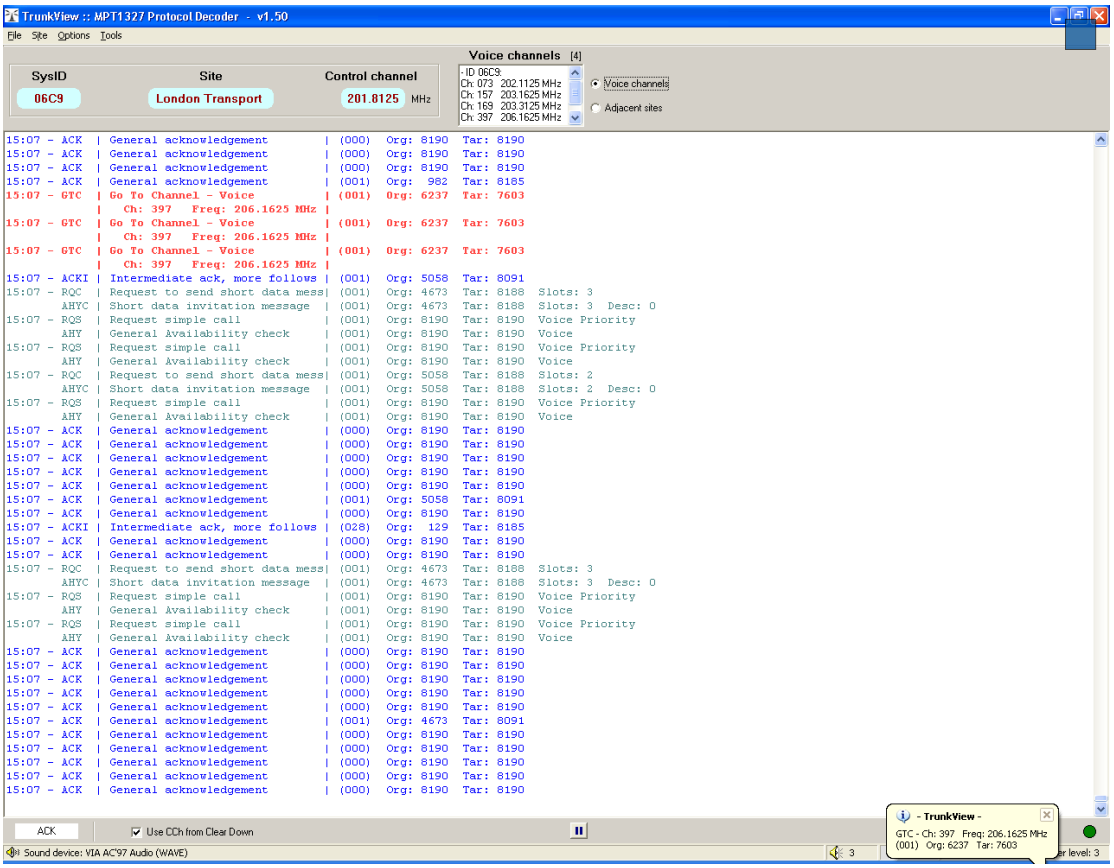
Video Monitoring

So far the Icom IC-R3 is do date, the only bona fide, integrated video capable scanner. This allows amplitude modulated (including analogue broadcast television) signals to be viewed in the 30 MHz to 2450 MHz range, and frequency modulated video in the 900 – 1300 MHz and 2250 to 2450 MHz ranges. However, in memory mode only the FMTV reception range can be expanded as far as 2999 MHz. Note that other equipment is available for monitoring video signals. A chapter is dedicated to the subject of video monitoring, so I'll only make a brief mention of this here.

Trunk Tracking

Trunked systems are computer controlled and have a pool of frequencies, which are dynamically assigned to users for the duration of the conversation, after which they are returned to the pool. The various types of trunked network, and options for tracking calls on them will be discussed in detail later on. Remember that due to there being a number of types of trunked systems in use, the so-called 'trunk tracking' scanners available cannot be expected to magically track any type of trunked system just because it is a trunked system! Unfortunately as scanners such as the Uniden and Radioshack trunk-tracking scanners are chiefly intended for the US market, they do not track MPT1327 systems since MPT1327 is not widely used in the United States. This is rather a disappointment since nearly all UK trunked networks are of this standard. This is a Radioshack Pro-2096 from Radioshack, which followed the example of Uniden's trunk-tracking scanners, which can track Motorolla Smartzone, EDACS and LTR trunked systems. Some even track the digital APCO25 systems used widely in the United States, although hardly at all in the UK.

Fortunately, there is software available which is able to track MPT1327 systems, and is able to control certain compatible scanners. For example, I am a user of 'TrunkView', which is able to control certain Icom, Uniden, Yaesu and AOR scanners. This is an example of TrunkView in use:



Dual watch/priority watch

Most (but by no means all) scanners have a priority channel feature in which you can select a programmed channel to be monitored regularly for activity even when scanning elsewhere. Allows you to scan elsewhere while avoiding missing something important on the selected channel. Some scanners only allow you to use the priority feature when scanning, but not searching. Be sure that you check this one out when buying if you anticipate using it a great deal.
Dual watch means you can simultaneously monitor two frequencies in the same or different bands. This is similar to the feature provided by many dual band amateur handhelds.

Close Call/Flash tune/Reaction tune

Hardly a substitute for a good frequency counter, but allows you to capture and display the frequency of a very strong signal from a transmitter close by. If you are in say a shopping mall and a security guard transmits nearby, you can immediately tune to the frequency in use and/or store it. Very useful! It is well worth remembering that the most recent Uniden close-call scanner, the UBC 3500XLT can be yours for around £150, compared to £400 for the Optoelectronics Frequency Finder, however.

Backlight Adjustment

Just about all scanners come with a backlight since the LCD display is often difficult or even impossible to see without it under some lighting conditions. As far as handheld scanners are concerned, it is helpful to be able to set this to on, off or automatic (light comes on when a control is used, or for some scanners briefly when a signal is detected). The setting of the backlight should be user selectable for battery saving reasons. One feature I like is being able to set the backlight to illuminate when a channel becomes active. Again this should be optional since in daylight it would serve only to consume extra power.

Attenuator

Sometimes your scanner can be too sensitive! Since your scanner's circuitry is designed to hear very weak, low level signals, an extremely strong nearby transmission, particularly FM broadcast, television and paging transmissions can cause your scanner to malfunction. Although permanent damage is rare except in very extreme cases, your scanner is unable to do its job correctly. It is worth noting that the attenuator will attenuate weak signals as well as the strong ones causing the problems, but it will at any rate allow you to hear some transmissions whereas the scanner otherwise locks up due to overloading. The best scanners have multiple levels of attenuation so you may find the best compromise possible.

Cloning

A feature of many Icom models, this allows you to copy the contents of a scanners memory to another of the same model. Only of any use at all if you know someone with the same model of course!

Searching & scanning speed

Quite simply, the faster the better. At 100 channels per second, a search of a whole 1000 channels will take ten seconds. At only 50 channels per second, a complete scanning cycle takes twice as long, and you are more likely to miss something. Certainly worth a look before you hand over your hard earned cash, although to be honest you probably won't normally scan all 1000 channels at once even if you have this may. When it comes to searching, a faster search rate effectively increases the rage of frequencies you can search and still stand a reasonable chance of encountering a transmission. To give you an idea of the predicament one often has here, we will use the military aviation band as an example. This covers about 225 to 400 MHz (ignoring the fact that 380 to 400 MHz is now in use for TETRA, although some military air use remains in this part of the range). This makes 175 MHz of spectrum to search for activity, and given that 25KHz channel spacing is used in this band, this makes for 7000 channels to search. At 50 steps per second, which nowadays is an average searching speed, then assuming that no birdies or local interference cause the search to stop, this makes two minutes twenty seconds to search the whole range. At only ten steps per second, this makes 11 minutes and 40 seconds to search the entire range. Now given that transmissions are short and also few and far between, you can see why it is quite possible to leave a scanner on automatic memory write all day and return to find few if any 'hits'.

Of course, your automatic memory write feature cannot differentiate between users and types of transmission, so you will always find most hits can be on data transmissions, birdies and taxi firms depending on the frequency range in question. But if you will be buying a scanner with automatic memory write, remember to choose one with a generous search speed, and do your homework – some scanners with this feature will happily sit the adding the same frequency to the automatic write memory channels over and over again! The very best models also store the CTCSS/DCS tone along with the frequency when carrying out an automatic search.

Memory channel/search frequency skip/lockout

Locking out a spot frequency from a search prevents the scanner from locking onto this frequency during a search. Useful to avoid a frequency on which either your scanner has a 'birdie' or there is a continuous transmission, such as a weather channel. Locking out a memory channel prevents it from being included in the scan operation but without you having to remove it from memory. Useful for volmets carrying weather information or broadcast frequencies with continuous transmission, which the scanner would otherwise stop on permanently.

Signal Strength Meter

Although you can get by without a signal strength meter, it is certainly nice to have, as without one, you cannot make any meaningful comparisons between aerials (or the same aerial placed in a different location in the hope of improving reception)!

Full/Partial Reset

Like any software, the firmware your scanner's microprocessor runs can crash. A partial reset can reset the processor without clearing all the memory information, whereas a full reset resets the scanner and erases the memory, replacing the default factory state. All programmed information will be lost, so consider yourself warned here! If possible, I would strongly recommend backing up the contents of your memories to your PC, before disaster strikes. When you think about how long 1000 memory channels will take to reprogram (possibly after a lot of searching for frequencies you cannot remember), prevention is definitely better than cure!

4) Aerial Matters

The illustration below is a fairly typical example of a shared use base station site (this particular one is at Highgate in North London). It sports a number of different aerial types, which are seen commonly. The flat rectangular 'boxes' are sector pannels. These provide sectored coverage (with a sector being an angle of 60˚, 90˚ or 120˚). These provide cellular network coverage on either 900 or 1800 MHz (for GSM) or 2100 MHz (for UMTS or '3G' phones). There are also co-linears for various PBR bands, in addition to Paknet and Mobitex data networks on 164 and 453 MHz, as well as a band 3 trunked network site in the 180 MHz area. Finally the cylindrical 'drums' are for the microwave links in the SHF band. These connect the base stations on the site to the rest of their network. For example in the case of the cellular networks, calls are multiplexed and relayed to the telephone exchanges. (Note that fibreoptic cabling can be used also where it is more economic).

The monitoring of frequencies in the SHF and EHF regions is impractical for the average scanner enthusiast for three reasons. Firstly, receivers for these frequencies are highly specialised and difficult to obtain, besides being expensive. Secondly, signals in this part of the spectrum are strictly 'line of sight', i.e. they are transmitted in narrow beams using high gain, highly directional antennas, so unless you can arrange your own 'in the beam', no reception will take place (radio amateurs use talkback frequencies in lower bands to pre-arange contacts on the microwave bands, since directly establishing a contact is almost impossible!). Thirdly, the transmissions are digital and are also multiplexed (and may be encrypted also), so there is little scope for monitoring. For this reason, even high-end scanners only cover up to 3 GHz or so. In fact, even old hands at scanning like myself get excited about any new finds over 1 GHz for this very reason (such as amateur satellite downlinks or video feeds). Another point to remember is that even the best co-ax cable available performs exceptionally poorly in the microwave range, hence satellite television signals being converted from 11-12 GHz at the LNB to around 1 GHz before being sent to the set-top box. (Connecting a scanner up to this can be quite interesting). At frequencies in GHz, one must use waveguides to convey signals. These are simply a hollow tube through which the signal is transmitted (on the 3cm/10 GHz amateur band, standard copper water pipe can be used for this purpose).

After your scanner itself, the aerial, and its feeder are the most important elements in your receiving station. Unfortunately, aerials are one area in which a great deal of marketing hype has been invented in order to exploit the inevitable confusion amongst newcomers to the hobby. One of the commonest claims runs something along these lines “Coverage: 25 – 1300 MHz”. Even 0.1-2000MHz is nowadays quite common! Now, clearly such a claim really can be loosely true even though the performance of the aerial will frankly be appalling throughout some, or most, of the quoted range, even if it is reasonable elsewhere. Remember, any piece of wire or lump of metal of any dimensions can carry such a specification! What is important here is how well it achieves it! So such a claim without any actual reference points at all essentially tells us nothing. The actual reason for a vague statement such as this is that however well a given aerial design may perform at one given frequency, the manufacturer cannot legally make such a misleading claim for such a vast range as quoted since it is simply not true. In essence, one aerial simply cannot do it all; it's not possible due to the laws of physics. This is a vital point, the characteristics of a given type of aerial are dependent on the laws of physics, not the marketing hype, and therefore cannot be changed, even after obfuscation attempts by, how shall I put it, less knowledgeable or reputable salesmen!

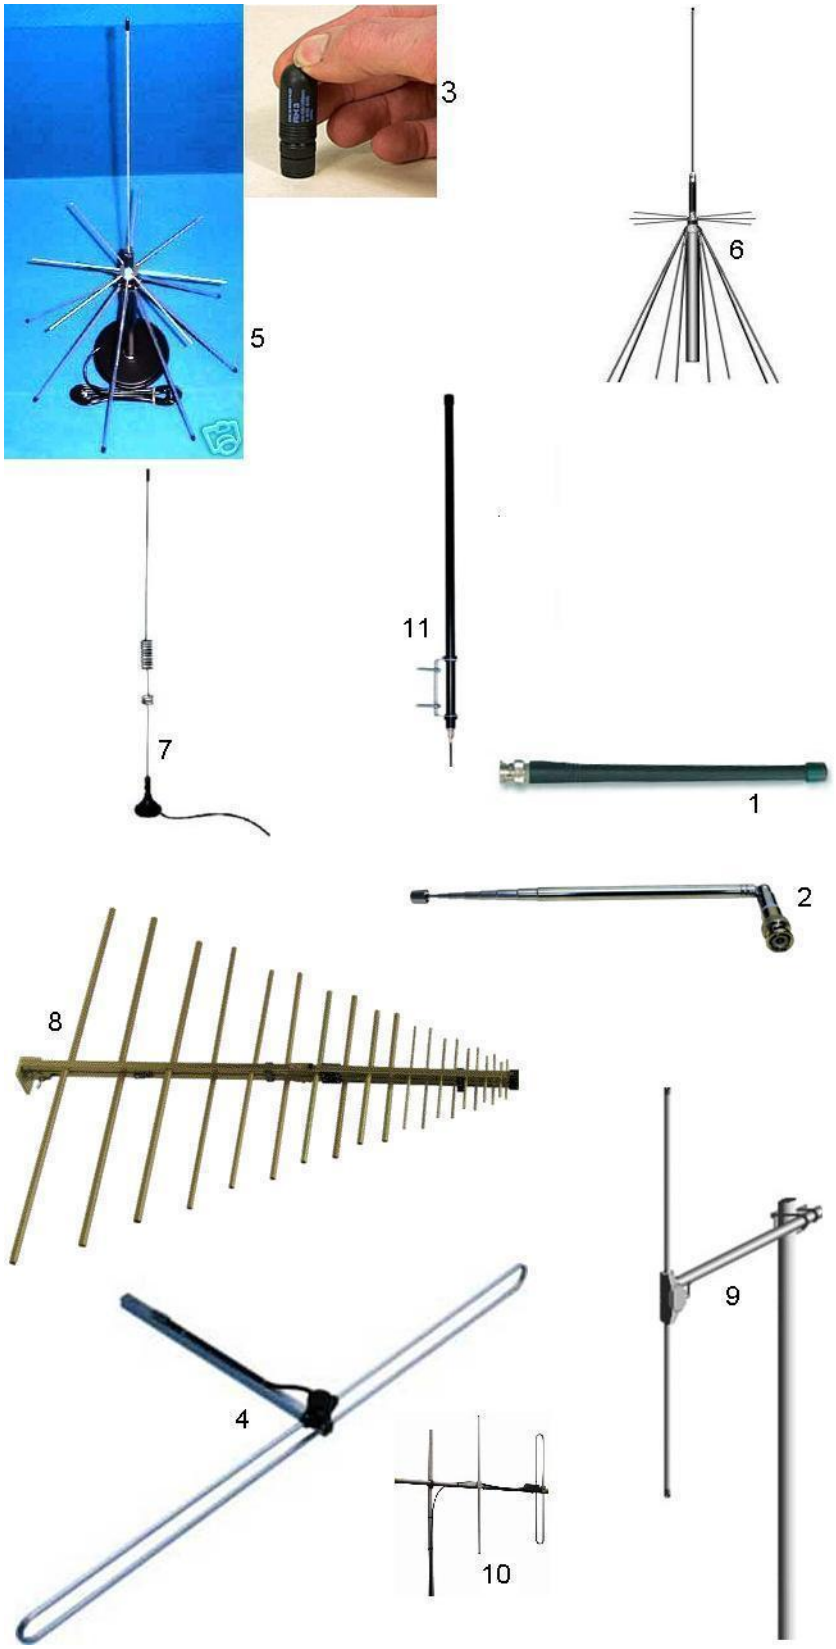
So, any 'wideband' aerial is at best a compromise. It is simply impossible for it to be resonant at every possible frequency. In order to provide some guidance as to what works best and where, I have included descriptions of a number of examples of aerials available on the market. It is well worth pointing out that in many instances, you cannot buy anything off the shelf meeting your precise requirements; you can at a price have one custom made or, at little cost, experiment with your own designs. It is here that your scanner's signal strength meter is vitally important for comparison. This is because although even the poorest aerial may appear good when a signal is strong enough, it may take you a while to realise, after thinking 'gosh, it's been quiet the last few days', that many or most stations you normally hear are not being heard simply because your aerial is not working correctly, you forgot to turn off the attenuator, or that you have left the wrong one connected for the frequencies you are presently trying to monitor! You can check the current signal strength of a station whose normal signal strength is known to you in order that any such problems are immediately obvious.



All scanners, whether base, handheld or computer based come supplied with either a helical (or 'rubber duck'), (1) or a telescopic whip (2). However, this is meant only to get you started. The helical is useful in the sense that it is well suited to portable usage as it is not easily broken and poses less risk of poking someone's eye out. The telescopic is slightly less convenient here, but whereas helical types can be resonant at only one or, at most two or three frequencies, the telescopic can at any rate be adjusted to a quarter wavelength for best reception; a commonly quoted formula in 'old money' is 2834 divided by the frequency in MHz, which gives the length at which the aerial is one quarter wavelength. Or if you prefer metric measurements, then try 14000 divided by 98 – the resulting length is in centimetres. On lower frequencies, aerial performance can be improved by the addition of a loading coil. Remember, the supplied aerial will give you some activity to listen to 'out of the box', but unless you use co-axial cable which is unsuitable, you will find that even a modest outdoor installation which is reasonably well sited will always give you much more. It is well worth remembering that it makes little sense to spend good money on your scanner and then skimp on aerials. This ultra-low profile design from Diamond (3) is actually a tri-band for the 2 metre, 70 cm and 23cm amateur bands, but although its performance is surprisingly good within these bands for it's physical size (4.5 cm length) even its modest receive performance falls away rapidly outside these bands. However, I do use it for discrete close range monitoring with my Alinco DJ-X7 as it gives the X7 the look of a small mobile phone - so as to avoid attracting attention!

These are all low gain aerials and unless you visit a nearby hilltop, you will find you receive fairly local signals only. If you can set up a reasonable outside aerial it will transform your scanners receiving capability. A discone is a reasonable improvement as although it gives no gain when compared to a ¼ wave dipole, it's effective over a very wide frequency range. So not the ideal kind of aerial to use if you want to chase the DX, but a good all round compromise to receive reasonably strong local signals. These are in fact multiband aerials with element lengths chosen to be resonant at a number of frequencies close enough together to give coverage of a wide part of the spectrum, although performance always seems to fall off well above the quoted lower frequency, due to the fact that the physical size of a ¼ wave element at 25MHz is prohibitive. Remember that although I say these are wideband, they are strictly speaking multi-band aerials, if the elements are reasonably close together in terms of their resonant frequency, they can effectively give continuous wideband coverage; the more elements they use, the better. Common sense would suggest that the wider their quoted coverage range, the greater the number of elements that would be needed, and it is inevitable that some compromise would be required since more elements do imply greater weight and wind loading. Also, discones tend to have a high radiation/reception angle towards the top of their intended coverage range, and this is less than ideal unless you are receiving signals from either satellites or aircraft! The so-called 'double discone' attempts to compensate for this characteristic. However, discones are at a much greater disadvantage. It is unfortunate that these aerials are none too discrete, and will tell anyone with a little knowledge that you own a scanner! After all, can you think of another hobby application for a discone? Well, although many can be used to transmit on several amateur bands, a multiband co-linear gives omni-directional coverage with gain thrown in as well.

Picture 5 is a desk version, which offers a slight improvement offer a telescopic if you place it near a window, although for lower frequencies a ground plane is needed to obtain reasonable performance, as it has a magnetic base, a flat radiator top is ideal; while the example in image 6 is designed for external use. You will need a sturdy mounting for the latter as wind loading can be a problem, as I have discovered through experience!

In situations where you cannot avoid using the telescopic or rubber duck, it is possible that you can improve reception by changing locations in the room. The reason for this is due to something called multipath reception (which gives the 'ghosting' effect on television pictures). At VHF or UHF, signals reflect off of many things, the more so for metallic or other conductive items. This effect is most pronounced in urban areas and more noticeable at UHF than VHF. Therefore, in any given location your aerial will receive the same signal from multiple reflections, which in some places will add together in strength, but in others will instead cancel each other out. So by moving your aerial by up to ½ of a wavelength, your reception can change dramatically. You may find a location where the signal strength lifts out of the noise level by a few dB.

It is also worth mentioning the subject of co-channel interference here. In order to allow re-use of frequencies, the usage of any given frequency is planned as far as possible so that individual licensed users are geographically spaced sufficiently far apart that their signals do not cause mutual interference. Also the use of CTCSS or DCS assists in avoiding co-channel interference since provided that an adjacent user of the frequency uses a different tone (or DCS code) the squelch on their radio does not open when their transmissions are received. Since their distant signal is also weak enough not to jam the wanted local signal, it gives the impression that they are the only user of the frequency.
However, suppose you live between their service areas, and want to monitor only one? Here the trick is to move your receiving aerial so as to either improve the signal strength of the wanted user or, often just as effective, to place it in a null for the unwanted one. Finally, you need to set the CTCSS tone or DCS code to match that of the user you wish to monitor, if indeed they are themselves using CTCSS or DCS.

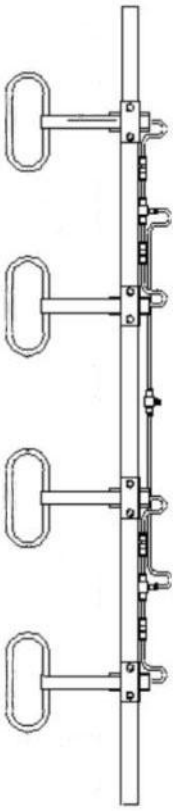
A dipole (9) is designed to be resonant at a particular frequency or in a narrow band, and if your interests lie solely in one band such as the civil aviation band, then this is a good design to invest in. The use of directors (10) increases the gain and directivity of a dipole (in this example it is a folded dipole). A co-linear (11) tuned for one or maybe two or three bands of interest are also a good bet; radio amateurs commonly have co-linears for the 6 meters, 2 meters and 70 cm bands, for example. These consist of phased dipoles stacked vertically within a UPVC or fibreglass tube.

A dipole can be folded giving it a small amount of gain (3dB perhaps) in a given direction and still some useful reception in other directions (4).
Where all signals of interest lie in one direction, and are in a very narrow frequency range of interest, a Yagi (named after its inventor) is the best choice as it gives a great deal of gain, depending on the number of elements employed. It does also receive from directly behind also, which is not always an advantage. In between the extremes, in terms of a compromise between gain and bandwidth, lies the log periodic (8), which gives a few dB of gain over a wider frequency range (for example 100-600MHz), and gives good directional response if well designed.
For mobile use, an aerial such as (7) is a reasonable choice for monitoring a fairly wide range of frequencies, although their performance at low and high frequencies is a particular compromise. These may be permanently attached, although magnetic mount designs can be removed when not needed so as to avoid theft or damage, and avoid any need to drill holes into the bodywork of your car. Remember, the speeds quoted are for wind speed, not necessarily road speed; nonetheless they should remain in place at any legal speed.

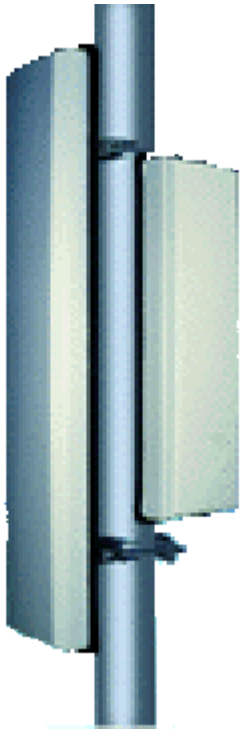
Besides the basic types of aerial mentioned, there are also many other types – your local radio amateurs can provide advice here. But beware – retailers may often try to sell you aerials, which may look great but will get you little gain for your money. Be wary for instance of claims that a desktop or other indoor aerial they stock can outperform an outdoor one – for example if you place the desktop discone near to a window then common sense dictates it is the lower attenuation of the glass that yields improved performance rather than clever aerial design! Of course, a piece of wire or stainless steel rod placed inside a plastic or fibreglass tube and neatly packaged may look good and be marketable – but ultimately it's an expansive way of buying a piece of rod or wire!
Just to complicate things, there are two decibel measurements in use. dBd refers to gain relative to a half wave dipole, whereas dBi refers to gain relative to an isotropic antenna, which has more gain than a half wave dipole. Therefore, 3dBi is a better figure than 3dBd. I am afraid that many advertisements simply quote gain in dB, so I am afraid you need some experience as to whether the figure is in dBi or dBd to know which. In my experience, many retailers actually quote gain in dBd to make the numbers look better. This is a classic example of how some try to play on people's ignorance in order to improve their sales! This is one reason why I would recommend that you buy your equipment from a reputable dealer who specialises in radio equipment. They are usually radio hobbyists themselves, and are therefore in a better position to advise you as to what equipment best needs your needs. They would also provide better customer service than those who specialise in say TV or hi-fi and sell a couple of scanner models in the corner of the shop.

If a large part of your interest lies in a particular part of the radio spectrum, then you may for example invest in a dedicated aerial for that part of the spectrum, and use say a discone for other reception. For example, if you will monitor the marine frequencies a good deal, then try approaching a supplier of marine radio equipment rather than your local Maplin store or worse, that shop specialising in TV or Hi-Fi. Likewise for amateur radio, aviation, citizens' band or PBR, to name a few examples.

If your primary interest does lie within a given area of the radio spectrum, and you cannot easily obtain a dedicated co-linear (which would often be my first choice for omni-directional coverage of an area with a useful amount of gain), then another option may be to construct a 'stack of dipoles' as illustrated to the right. This is a viable option since commercial folded dipoles exist for all the common PBR bands, as well as for all of the VHF and UHF amateur bands. Obviously, for low VHF frequencies the 'stack' will need quite a lot of space due to the physical size of the dipoles. It is also flexible since the folded dipoles give some useful gain (3dB for a single folded dipole, using a phasing harness their gain can be combined). However, some calculation would be required if you want to design your own phasing harness since the dipoles must be exactly in phase with each other in order for their gain to combine (if they are out of phase, they would not combine correctly, and if two were exactly out of phase, they would cancel each other out!). Commercial phasing harnesses for the common PBR bands are available.
One of the strengths in a stack of dipoles is that although you do get some gain in a chosen direction, a useful amount of reception from other directions is available also.



Another useful property of the stack of dipoles is that the user can configure the gain characteristics. In the above example, the dipoles are arranged so that the gain is combined in one direction. This would be the choice if, for example, you want to listen say to shop watch frequencies in a distant town or city, all of which are on similar frequencies. Alternatively, you can place the dipoles with two facing in one direction, and two in another. This allows you to allocate the gain between two different directions. For example, if you live between two towns of interest, then this configuration would be ideal. Of course, you may also arrange the dipoles at 90 degrees to each other giving roughly omni directional coverage with the gain of a single folded dipole. By roughly I mean that this is really an overlapping multi-directional configuration, rather than a true omni-directional one. The only real disadvantage of a stack of dipoles lies in its fairly narrow frequency range.



Sector panels are another specialised type of antenna, which try to offer a compromise between gain and bandwidth, and also, in this case, beam width. These are most familiar at cellular telephone base stations, operating in the 900, 1800 and 2100 MHz bands, but are available for frequencies from typically a few hundreds of MHz up to about 5-6 GHz. Applications outside the cellular telephone industry include wireless networking, outside broadcasting, and in a more limited market, amateur radio and wireless video camera applications. These typically have a beam width of 60, 90 or 120 degrees.

Sector panels can be rectangular, square or circular in shape, and the orientation of the panel case does not always determine polarisation. Rather, it is the dipole's arrangement inside which determines polarisation. This can be horizontal, vertical or even circular, see the video monitoring section for a description of circular polarisation, since this is the area in which you are most likely to encounter circularly polarised signals. These give a gain from 3dB up to maybe 30dB, depending on how they are designed. Although quite expensive and (depending on the frequency and application) may be difficult to obtain, they have their part to play. I use a 2.4GHz sector panel intended for wireless networking to send and receive amateur television signals in the 13cm amateur band, as well as for 2.4 GHz video monitoring.

If you cannot find an aerial designed specifically for a given application, you can use your initiative here and think what other services, for which equipment is easily obtainable, are similar in frequency. For example, for the 31MHz cordless phone band, a CB aerial for the 26-28 MHz area can be easily shortened slightly for best performance if you're a real perfectionist, although to be honest it's OK for receiving on 31MHz to begin with. This is because resonance is somewhat less critical for receiving as opposed to transmitting. All supplied telescopic and rubber duck aerials, which come supplied with your scanner will definitely perform poorly at relatively low frequencies like this, even in a good location.

One 'all in one' kit for handhelds is available from Diamond. This is the RHS-1000 kit (shown below) which comes in a standard case normally used for VHS video cassettes. It consists of 4 aerial sections, 2 loading coils, a 'linking adapter' (for connecting two sections together, and a BNC base unit (with a BNC to SMA adapter also to cater for scanners utilising a SMA aerial socket as used on the smallest scanners). The instructions show how to make up an aerial resonant at any frequency between 75 and 1750 MHz. Throughout some of this range either a ¼ wave, or alternatively a ¾ or 5/8th wave, antenna can be constructed. Incidentally, a suitably constructed aerial can also be used to transmit on the 2 metre, 70 centimetre or 23 centimetre amateur bands, with a maximum power of 10 watts. This may be useful if you are going to an event and know what given band you will be monitoring, for example at an air show or yachting regatta. Useful to keep in your car glove compartment in case you forget the correct aerial for your handheld.

Amplified or Active Aerials/Preamplifiers

An active antenna at first sight seems to be the answer to every reception problem. Poor reception? Problem solved? Well – oops, not always.
You see, scanners must on the one hand be able to cope with weak signals, particularly handhelds, where a low gain rubber duck or telescopic is in use. However, sometimes problems are caused by signals being too strong! This is particularly true of a handheld connected to a high gain aerial, in the presence of very strong local transmitters.
The trouble with pre-amplifiers is that they do exactly what they say on the tin. Yes, if they give 20dB gain, they do this for the weaker signals and – the coin drops: they do exactly the same for the strong signals too! For this reason I would suggest that an amplifier is beneficial if you live somewhere remote such as the Scottish Highlands where you can reasonably guarantee that all signals you can receive at all will be distant, but if say you live in central London where string signals exist in abundance, then the amplifier will serve only to overload the input stages of your scanner making it seem that you can hear just about everything on the spectrum all at once - and regardless of where you tune! In particular, beware the taxi firm 100 yards away, the local television and FM broadcast stations and in particular the dreaded paging transmissions which are still going strong in spite of text messaging and mobile email.

Unless you live far out ‘in the sticks’, I would generally recommend that you avoid the use of active antennas or wideband pre-amplifiers unless you are unlucky enough to be stuck in a poor situation, where you have no option but to use a long length of co-ax (such as being in a ground floor flat or basement), or you are using a vintage radio which has become rather ‘deaf’, or in other words, insensitive. In this case, your set-up may become a little bit more usable. But in any event, I would venture that your best investment of your hard earned cash would be in low-loss co-axial cable or in a new and more sensitive radio!
Before you invest in an active antenna or wideband pre-amplifier, you may well wish to consider your local environment and perhaps ask to ‘test drive’ the amplifier to evaluate how it will perform in your own situation.

This is an example of a pre-amplifier from Ramsey Electronics, covering frequencies from 1 MHz up to 1GHz. Note however that a narrow band pre-amplifier which caters for a specific frequency range (for example a given amateur band or an area of the VHF or UHF used by satellite downlinks), may very well suit your needs better, and will certainly avoid the problem of strong signals on far removed frequencies being amplified also, overloading your scanner and obliterating the weak signals you are trying to amplify. When you are trying to receive low-level signals, out of band attenuation is every bit as important as in band amplification.

The same caution applies to active, alias amplified, antennas. The Dressler ARA2000 is quoted as being one of the better active antennas available. However, given its very high price ($900 US!), I would very much recommend you instead invest this (if you have a budget in this range) in a new top of the range receiver, a generous length of low loss co-ax, and have a good amount left for accessories. Don't neglect the co-ax; your new rooftop aerial isn't much use with poor co-ax. Indeed, this amount of money really could buy you a complete set-up.
Remember also that active antennas are only suitable for receiving; you cannot transmit into an active antenna. Attempting to do so would immediately damage the antenna and, quite possibly, your transceiver also.
It is also well worth remembering that in a typical installation, the addition of an extra level of amplification will serve only to increase the level of your noise floor: after all, all amplification introduces noise, and there is already a very good pre-amplifier in the input stages of your receiver which is more selective than your wideband masthead amplifier, be it inside the aerial mounting or otherwise. Remember – electronically generated noise and already very strong, local signals have one thing in common – they cannot be filtered out by amplification!

After all, you have to remember that you do in fact only listen to one signal at a given time, so why do you need to amplify everything, simultaniusly?

Another example of how 'cowboy' retailers seem to think scanner enthusiasts are fair game for ignorance on aerial matters, which has come to my attention from time to time, concerns a so-called converter box, which claims to turn your standard TV aerial into an excellent scanning aerial! There shouldn't be much explaining to do here really, should there? Firstly, your high gain TV aerial is pointed at an extremely high-powered transmitter (your local TV transmitter), and so connecting your scanner to it is likely to overload its input stages. Secondly, it is not of much use in receiving at frequencies much outside the UHF TV band, so unless you want to listen to analogue television audio (for TV Dxing) it is pointless trying to use it anyway. Thirdly, depending on where you live, your TV aerial is likely to be horizontally polarised, whereas all communications signals are vertically polarised. (Although relay stations usually transmit vertically polarised signals, the main television transmitter sites broadcast using horizontal polarisation. This means that cross polarisation coupling loss will loose you nearly all of the little signal your horizontally polarised TV aerial would receive outside of its designed frequency range anyway!). Fourthly, since televisions and their attached paraphernalia are solid state, there may be enough voltage and current leakage present on the aerial socket to actually damage the input stages of your scanner. What is more, many of these devices provide no splitter circuit, so not only does a direct connection between the TV and your scanner render your scanner liable to damage caused by current leakage, but also the resulting impedance mismatch may ruin your TV reception into the bargain!

Also, bear in mind that most television aerials are fairly narrow-band even within the TV band. Here I am referring to the fact that channels are 'grouped' (see the section on video reception for details). This is by virtue of the fact that wideband television aerials offer less gain than an equivalent grouped aerial having the same number of elements, and therefore as far as is possible, all television transmitters in the country (prior to the coming of channel 5 in 1997, which had to be slotted in anywhere it could be accommodated, thus making a nonsense of the original, well designed four channel band plan!), offered BBC1, BBC2, ITV and Channel 4 on close channels. For example, a 'group A' aerial designed to cover channels 21 to 34 will not perform well elsewhere in the band. Any television aerial will barely receive at all outside the television band, and will certainly have a sporadic reception pattern and offer absolutely no gain to speak of!
And finally, if you are planning to use a pre-amp at the masthead, it is worth noting that most television aerials are of a Yagi design, and thus present a DC short circuit (as I learnt to my cost when experimenting with an analogue satellite receiver and a 23cm yagi once!). A few receivers are designed to provide power to a supplied pre-amp, and therefore cannot be used with a yagi or folded dipole since they cause a short circuit.

Aerial Setting & Location

The essential point to keep in mind as far as aerials are concerned is that they are the single most vital element in your receiving station. Remember, we are not talking of radio or television broadcasting where transmitter powers can run into tens or even hundreds of kilowatts; these are low level communications signals transmitted at powers measured in watts or even milliwatts, and in order to accomplish our objective we must gather them in as efficiently as we possibly can. You will have invested a reasonable amount of hard earned cash in your scanner, and as I have already hinted it would clearly be a waste not to get the best out of it by being a miser when it comes to the aerial. And whilst on this subject we must not neglect the humble co-axial cable, (which is simply a cable screened for conveying signals from your aerial to the scanner) – after all, an analogy comes to mind here: spending a great deal of money on a scanner and an aerial system, and then using cheap or low quality cable is somewhat like investing a great deal of money in a stereo system and then connecting poor quality speakers to it!

It is important to realise that cable losses can be significant, and will increase dramatically with both cable length and frequency. Indeed at frequencies measured in gigahertz one gives up even attempting to use co-ax at all due to the very poor performance of even the best quality cable at such frequencies. The table below allows easy comparison of various types of co-axial cable. For example, at 400 MHz, one can see that RG-35 has a much lower loss than RG-22. Also RG-22 is unsuitable due to its impedance, as I shall explain in a moment.

In essence, the impedance (symbol Z) is derived from three electrical characteristics called resistance, inductance and capacitance, and is measured in Ohms – the symbol for which is the Greek letter omega, Ω. In order for the maximum possible transfer of signal from the aerial to the co-ax, and thence to the scanner, the aerial, co-ax and scanner input stage must all be of the same impedance. It is important to note that by convention all communications equipment (and this includes scanners) is manufactured to a 50 Ω standard, whereas most broadcast receivers including television sets is made to a 75 Ω standard. Therefore, don't be tempted to use any TV co-ax you may have lying around as it is not suitable. Not only is it the wrong impedance, but also will not even fit the connecters (BNC, TNC, N-type or SMA for example), and what's more compared to even modest quality co-ax cable it's performance is poor indeed. Poor co-ax or an unsuitable type of co-ax cable for the application can loose you quite a few dB's of signal – probably without you even knowing it!

Also, it is worth keeping in mind that the figures quoted are for 400MHz – they are horrifyingly higher at say 1300 MHz, the finishing point of most scanners' coverage. If your scanner has coverage up to say 3.3GHz (as the Icom IC-R20 does, as the highest upper limit I know) then to be honest none of the types listed above would do; I would probably have to invest in some LDF450 or similar, and that costs several pounds per metre! After all, the low GHz area is an awkward part of the spectrum since co-ax losses are becoming extortionate, whereas waveguides (very practical high in the microwave spectrum) are physically too large to be practical here. Indeed, the uselessness of even short co-ax runs at SHF frequencies explains why satellite television signals are converted down from say 11 to 12 GHz at the LNB to 1 – 2 GHz before being fed down the co-ax, and hence why an analogue satellite receiver can tune the 23cm amateur band, which lies between 1240 and 1325 MHz. In fact satellite co-ax is good value for money, given its fairly low loss and reasonable price, however keep in mind that it is 75 Ω. Also, the outer sheath is often aluminium or stainless steel which cannot be soldered!

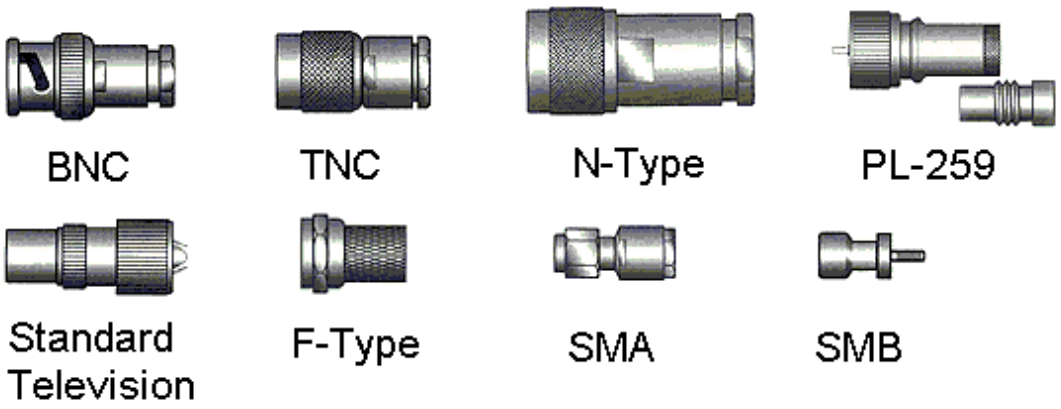
Anyway, the advice here is as follows: Choose the types of co-ax with the lowest possible loss and impedance as close to 50W as you possibly can (you can order this at your local Maplin store or from many online radio dealers), and keep runs as short as possible (no loose coils in case you might re-locate the scanner in future, say), and this means physically locating the scanner as close as possible to the aerial site.
If you really have no choice but to use a very long run of co-ax then a masthead pre-amplifier would be a sensible investment, even though I would normally advise against their use. This amplifies signals received before sending them down your co-ax to compensate for losses.

The actual location of the aerial should be as high up and in the clear as possible, away from sources of interference such as computers and other electrical equipment. Mounted above your roof is the best option; it is possible to mount it in your attic but keep in mind that here it is not only closer to interference sources but also signals will be attenuated buy passing though the roof, particularly at higher frequencies and when the roof is wet. The rule of thumb is to get the aerial as high as possible until it is as well clear of surrounding roofs and trees as possible, above this a further ten or twenty feet has little benefit, and in any case will add both cost and co-ax loss, as well as making your installation less discrete and harder to guarantee its safety.

Needless to say, your aerial needs to be physically safe as besides the obvious danger of it falling onto people or property, in some areas overhead power lines are an additional concern. These might possibly look similar to telephone lines as far as some people are concerned, so it really is best to assume all overhead cables to be dangerous and treat them accordingly. Scanning and other radio hobbyists have been electrocuted by aerials making contact with overhead power lines so please ensure that your aerial is positioned well away from them. For your own safety and that of others. A good rule would be to allow twice the distance from the power lines as the aerial is high. This should ensure that it cannot come into contact with them – nor would you if using a ladder.

Connectors

There are quite a number of connectors for RF use, which you will come across. For the purpose of identification, here are some of the most frequently encountered, and their description.



BNC (Bayonet Neill Concelman):

This was designed by Bell Labs Engineer Paul Neill and Amphenol Engineer Carl Concelman. This is by far the commonest connector found on scanners and scanning accessories, looking rather like a miniature bayonet light bulb connection. This connector is normally 50Ω but a 75 Ω version is also available from stores such as maplin for use with CCTV equipment. You will ideally need the regular 50 Ω version unless you are doing something specialised, such as using a satellite receiver for video monitoring. This connector has a quoted frequency range up to perhaps 4 GHz.

TV (European Type):

A connector mainly used in the television industry, its impedance is roughly 75 Ω and so it is not really suitable for scanner usage – and in fact does not even fit 50 Ω cable anyhow! For that mater no BNC or SMA adapters are available due to the impedance mismatch.

F Type:

A low-cost connector designed for satellite TV, cable TV, and amateur television applications, but being 75 Ω is not used by any scanner I have yet encountered. When terminated the centre conductor of the coaxial cable becomes the centre connection of the plug, which in my view is a bit of a bodge! Quoted frequency range is up to 2GHz making it usable for satellite IF (intermediate frequency) usage. It is possible to obtain adapters (only with a great deal of difficulty!) if you wish to connect a (video) scanner such as the Icom IC-R3 directly to the cable system to view channels you cannot normally receive, although use of the attenuator is recommended since the signal sent down the cable is rather too strong for many scanners to handle. Any scanner can of course receive the cable audio in WFM mode on frequencies between about 70 and 550 MHz, with most analogue channel spacings of 8 MHz.

TNC (Threaded Neill Concelman):

Invented by and named after Amphenol Engineer Carl Concelman and Bell Labs Engineer Paul Neill. This coaxial connector is similar to a BNC only it has screw type coupling mechanism; it was originally designed to reduce static and wear affecting BNC's under conditions of extreme vibration, for example in aircraft or on motorcycles. This connector is available in 50 Ω and 75 Ω versions. This connector has a quoted frequency range of up to 11 GHz! I have not as yet seen this used on scanners but a few handheld CB radios, and some commercial PBR transceivers in particular do use it. If you want to connect a TNC aerial to your scanner you will need an adapter.

N Type (Neill):

Despite the claimed performance of BNC and TNC connectors, this would be my choice when working with microwave frequencies, say above 1 GHz. Invented by and Bell Labs engineer Paul Neill and developed in the 1940's. This uses a screw type connection. This connector is available in 50 Ω and 75 Ω versions, and is found in amateur applications in the microwave bands at 23cm (1240-1325 MHz and up) due to its very low loss. It is also used in wireless networking applications in the 2.4GHz and 5.7GHz ranges. This connector has a frequency range up to 11 GHz or so and so I have seen it used on some satellite installations. This is not found on scanners due to its size, but some commercially available aerials intended for wireless networking employ N Type connectors. You may wish to use these for receiving ATV signals if you have a video capable scanner, or for receiving on the 13 and 23 cm amateur bands as it best fits the co-ax used at these frequencies, besides having excellent performance. You will need an adapter.

UHF (Ultra High Frequency) Type:

Invented by Amphenol Engineer E. Clark Quackenbush for use in the radio industry at the time. This is a coaxial connector with a screw type coupling mechanism. This connector is more often than not referred by its' military part number, PL259. In spite of being (miss)named, this connector is quite low quality (in terms of its performance at UHF frequencies, above about 300MHz), because for one thing this connector exhibits a variable impedance and unacceptably high loss at UHF frequencies, which are considered to begin at 300MHz! In fact unless you have a VHF only scanner, for example one covering only civil airband, I would give this one a miss. This is a general-purpose connector developed for use up to a maximum frequency of only about 300 MHz, although being rather a perfectionist I personally regard its maximum useful frequency to be about 150MHz, since I would not use it on amateur bands higher than two meters. It is fine at HF or lower VHF frequencies however, and many CB sets use it – it is common on mobile sets in particular. When used with small diameter coaxial cables a reducing adapter is needed for a reliable fit.

SMA (Sub miniature Version A):

This is a sub miniature coaxial connector with a screw type coupling mechanism and an impedance of 50 Ω. This connector was developed in the 1960's. This connector has a quoted frequency range up to about 18 GHz, and is found on miniature handheld scanners such as the Icom IC-R2 and some 'micro' transceivers. To use the majority of aerials having a BNC connector you will need an adapter. It is best to avoid anything too heavy however since this places rather a strain on the SMA connector. Note that a 'reverse thread' version is available for wireless networking usage, be careful when buying that you get the normal version.

SMB: (Sub miniature Version B):

This is miniature coaxial connector similar in appearance to the SMA, only this one has a 'quick release' mechanism. This connector is available in both 50 Ω and 75 Ω versions. The 50 Ω version has a quoted frequency range up to 4 GHz, which is more than adequate. This is not found on scanners, at least on any model released to date, which is a shame as it would avoid a lot of fumbling around(!), but may be found on certain aerials available for other applications, which may possibly be of use in specialised aspects of the hobby.

*Polarisatio*n

This refers to the physical orientation of the aerial. With only the two exceptions, which are broadcasting, and some amateur transmissions, signals are transmitted at VHF and UHF using a vertically positioned aerial. An aerial whose radiating elements are arranged vertically will radiate a signal, which is polarised in the same plane and is therefore said to be vertically polarised. Therefore, your receiving aerial needs to also be vertically polarised. In theory, a horizontally polarised aerial would receive no signal at all from a vertically polarised transmitting aerial, and vice versa. In practice, objects nearby can reflect the signal in such a way that the polarisation may be altered – but even so the received signal strength will be greatly reduced. This is, for example, one of several reasons why your television aerial is no use for scanning – besides being designed for the wrong frequencies, and being of the wrong impedance, as well as the co-ax not being compatible either, if your area is served by a main transmitter its polarisation will be horizontal (generally speaking, for television main transmitters use horizontal polarisation and relay stations vertical polarisation). Some video transmissions use circular polarisation; this is due to the fact that clockwise circular polarised signals produce anti-clockwise polarised reflections. Since the typical polarisation loss of an aerial which 'winds the reflected signals the wrong way' is of the order of 30dB, this provides good protection from ghosting due to multi-path reception. Some satellite transmissions also use circular polarisation. A circular polarised signal incurs about 3dB of loss if received with either a vertically or horizontally polarised aerial. Many outside broadcast video transmissions (some of which can be found in the 2.4 GHz ISM band, or adjacent SAB spectrum) use circular polarisation.

So whatever aerial types you decide to use, they need to be vertically polarised with only a very few exceptions.

5) Miscellaneous Equipment

Having now covered the basics, there are many other accessories available, which will be of use in furtherance of your hobby.

Antenna Switching Units

These provide a convenient means by which to change aerials without constant plugging and unplugging. If you have say three or four aerials for different areas of the radio spectrum, then a switching unit is ideal. These are available from amateur radio dealers, and typically cost a few pounds and up. One word of warning – some loss is inevitably introduced. Beware of such units which are intended for CB radio or for HF usage only; their losses at UHF will be huge. Note that although you may connect them in reverse so as to connect more than one scanner to a single aerial, you will find that not only is the signal split several ways, which invariably will result in attenuation, but since the scanners are electrically connected, they will now all be affected by each others 'birdies'. So this arrangement is of only limited usefulness in my opinion. Their real use is to provide a seamless means by which to switch rapidly between antennas, without a lot if frantic screwing and unscrewing, which is going to be highly inconvenient and cause a great deal of wear and tear.
I have also seen units, which claim to allow you to run both your scanner and your car radio from your standard car aerial. Remember, although this is great from the point of view of discretion, your car aerial is optimised for the FM broadcast band, and any electrical noise from the car which is picked up from a poorly screened feeder (remember, strong broadcast stations are easier to hear above ignition noise than low level communications signals). The impedance is unlikely to be ideal either. In my opinion the matter is rather academic anyway; you will in practice listen to either music radio or to the scanner, surely not both.

Power supplies

If your only scanner is a handheld then no doubt you will want to run it off the mains supply when at home; also many scanners charge batteries internally this way whilst allowing you to use the scanner. If you visit electrical stores you can pick up units, which convert the 230-volt mains to voltages from 3 to 12 volts typically to run such items as personal stereos from the mains. These come in two basic types – regulated and unregulated. Of the two I strongly recommend a regulated supply. This is because unregulated supplies may well provide a voltage considerably above that advertised, particularly if the current drain is less than that of their intended application. For example, a 12-volt supply may in fact provide 15 or 16 volts under no load. If using an unregulated supply, be sure to test the voltage using a multimeter and choose the setting which actually provides the correct voltage – don't ever take the markings on the power supply as gospel. Even though some scanners are able to accept a wide voltage range (for example, the Alinco DJ-X3 accepts anywhere from 3.6 volts to 16 volts; it obviously has an internal voltage regulator), most require a specific voltage; so be sure to consult the manual!
Keep in mind that handheld scanners generally take different voltages from about 3 volts up to 13.8 volts, so choose a matching supply voltage. Note that due to their poor voltage regulation and rectification (of the AC mains supply), power supplies intended for electric trains and cars are not suitable. At best you will hear an AC hum on the audio, at worst damage to the scanner's circuitry may result. It really isn't worth the risk of 'frying' something you paid a lot of money for, just to save a few pounds on a suitable power unit, that's if the scanner didn't come with its own.

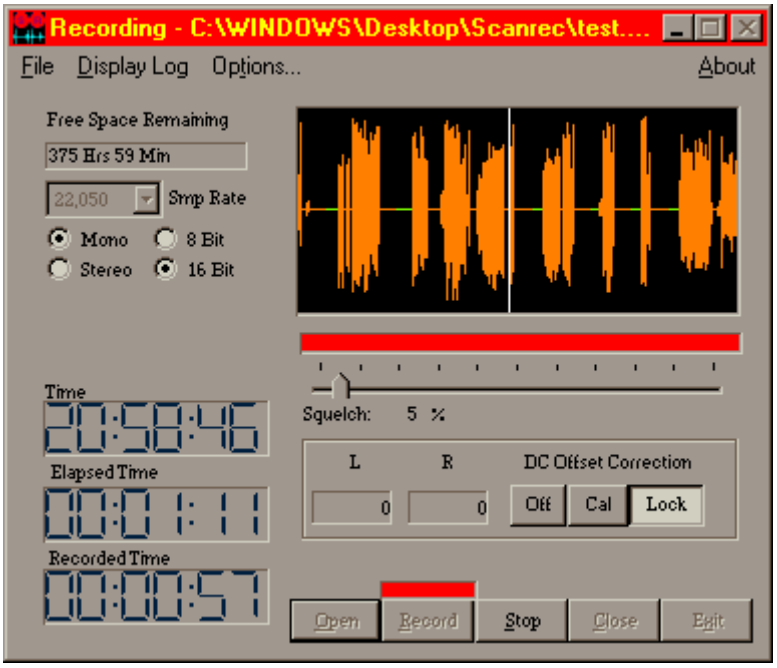
It's also worth remembering that some manufacturers for some reason better known to themselves make the centre pin on the power input jack negative, unlike the majority, so be sure to check the polarity before connecting as not all equipment has protection against reverse voltage – even though it would be a simple matter of adding a diode to block reverse voltage. (If I can think of simple, cost effective solutions to perfectly straightforward questions, why can't the manufacturers?).
There are also switched mode power supplies available, having the advantage of being smaller and lighter than a conventional supply. These are fine for laptop computers and such like, but they are less than suited to this application since they generate all manner of interference over wide expenses of spectrum, particularly on HF.
Where scanners do provide a means to charge rechargeable batteries in the scanner, do keep in mind that they generally cater only for nickel cadmium types (unless the manufacturer supplies lithium-ion packs as standard.). Generally, it is unwise to try to charge other types of battery than that for which the charging circuit is intended.
Some scanners, notably many Radio shack/Realistic handheld types, have two separate power jack sockets, one is to charge rechargeable batteries if they are installed, the other is to power the scanner only; no power is supplied to charge the internal batteries. Be certain to use the latter if you have non-rechargeable batteries installed!!

Recording audio from your Scanner

If you want to avoid missing out on activity overnight or whilst at work say, then you will want to record the day's or night's activity. Another reason to record may be due to the fact that some interesting channels may carry only a few minute's usage in the space of a day. This can be accomplished in a number of ways.

A tape recorder is the obvious choice as you presumably have one already available. However, due to the fact that recording time is limited, and in any case it is extremely tedious to find two minutes activity on the tape, you will want to use a recorder that is voice activated. A Dictaphone such as is used by secretaries is ideal. The only problem is that tape based systems are somewhat slow to start recording, and so are not suitable for recording high-speed data signals. This delay may result in you missing the call sign. An alternative is to use a program such as scanner recorder, shown below:



This not only records to a standard audio format such as MP3 or wave format, it also records the exact time at which activity took place.

The Icom IC-R20 broke new ground since it includes a built in voice recorder, which allows you to record the action wherever and whenever you happen to be. Also you can listen to the recordings any time, any place. There are three quality settings, fine, normal and long time, giving 1 hour, two hours and four hours recording time at 64, 32 and 16 kbps respectively. The only drawback concerns the file format; this is a proprietary format stored on your PC in files with a .ICW extension which cannot be played on the PC, although a third party program is available to convert these into wave format. I have been told that the reason that the recordings are not playable on the PC itself is due to both technical and software licensing considerations. Although the integrated circuit, which was intended for use in mobile phones and digital voice recorders, which is used to used to record the voice data is very efficient at recording audio data so that up to four hours of digital audio can be stored in the built-in 32 MB of RAM (which is not a great deal, my first MP3 player with 32MB of RAM would only store about half an hours music at an acceptable quality!), it seems that the codec used is patented and Icom were unable to licence it within the CS-R20 software used to interface the IC-R20 to the PC. In any case, 32MB in this day and age is rather minimal to say the least, we don't pay for memory by the byte any more and 1 1GB storage card for devices such as digital cameras or smart phones retails for under £10 at time of writing. For that matter, I do wish scanner designers would take advantage of 'smart cards' for storing memory contents also since it would allow the number of memories to be limitless, and far more versatile than always having to have access to a PC to load or store the contents. Imagine being able to change memory cards when visiting another part of the country or for overseas travel, with the same ease as you can put your SIM card into somebody else's phone to make a call if your own has run out of charge, for example.
Nonetheless, in my opinion the IC-R20 voice recorder is currently second to none in the sense that not only does it do a better job of recording from the airwaves than PC based solutions, let alone tape recording, but also you can record the action and replay it wherever and whenever you choose – you are not tethered to your PC. More versatile than PC based recording, if only you didn't have to copy the recordings back to the IC-R20 to play them later; a lengthy operation as the USB port on the IC-R20 is rather slow compared to those on other devices.

Certainly the IC-R20 is vastly better than the AOR 8200/8600 when it comes to recording; the AOR radios require an expensive add-on expansion card just to record a rather pitiful 20 seconds of audio!
Whatever method of recording you opt for, used correctly, you can both avoid missing any of the action, and avoid the need to be sat listening to your scanner all day waiting for that elusive catch.

Frequency Counters

These are in essence a radio receiver designed to search a large part of the radio spectrum, for instance from 1 MHz to 3GHz looking for a single transmission standing out in strength from the rest. They are chiefly intended to aid testing and alignment of transmitters; however they can also be used to discover the frequency at which a nearby transmitter is operating. Used correctly, you can discover the frequency used by the security guards at your local shopping mall by hanging around doing some 'window shopping' until one transmits nearby.
It is worth pointing out that counters are only useful where a well defined carrier frequency is detectable – they do not generally work well where wideband television signals, TDMA (Time Division Multiple Access) transmissions where the carrier pulses rapidly, or of course spread spectrum transmissions are concerned – although these are of course no use for listening to anyway.
Although there are now high end counters available which are even able to determine the frequency of pulsed digital signals such as GSM.

It is also well worth remembering that these only work at all if there is a single dominant signal, which stands well out above the rest in strength. Therefore you will not get a meaningful result if, say you visit a transmitter site where several separate transmissions are taking place at once.
It helps greatly if you select an aerial suitable for the frequency range in use; with practice you can tell whether your security guard is using VHF or UHF by the type of aerial atop his handheld. A reasonable wideband aerial such as a Watson W-801MK which gives reasonable wideband results for a handheld scanner is likely to be of little use with a counter. A telescopic is ideal provided that you adjust it to the optimum length for the frequency range in question.
As a general rule, higher powered base stations provide a useful readout from up to several hundred yards away (if only one transmission is present); for handhelds you will usually need to be in sight for an accurate reading. For very low powered devices such as cordless telephones you will need to place the counter's aerial within about a foot.

The Aceco PC 3002 is a top-of-the-range counter, which has more functions than a basic counter, which may not even retain a captured frequency once the transmission has stopped! Used correctly, and with a little luck on the day, a frequency counter can be invaluable for locating mystery frequencies, and can save many long hours of searching!

At the far end of the range for frequency counters is the Optoelectronics Frequency Finder. This sweeps between 10 MHz and 2.6GHz, and has 1000 memories to store details of nearby transmissions. This also comes pre-programmed with FCC band plans, but although of no use on this side of the pond, you can create custom band plans for your own country in a text file, which you then upload from your PC. It has a beep/vibrate alert feature similar to many pagers and cellular phones, and can 'reaction tune' many receivers including my Icom IC-R20. At £400 however, it is not a cheap piece of kit!

Cordless Audio Devices

If your base scanner is in the shack, yet you cannot spend much time there, then cordless audio devices such as wireless headphones may be of help as they are just as useful for relaying footage from your scanner as music from your sound system. You have the option to listen either using the headphones as normal, or using another scanner if you have one to hand. Indeed, a scanner can be used to allow more than one person to listen to wireless headphone systems.
Of course if you have a baby monitor gathering dust since it hasn't been needed for quite some time, then this may find a new lease of life. Cordless headphone systems operate in the 433 or 863 MHz bands, whereas baby monitors are normally on 49MHz.

In Car Amplification

If you have only a handheld scanner in your car, you will find the audio output rather inadequate due to the high ambient noise level. The good news is that most cars already contain an amplifier in the form of a sound system. If you are very lucky, it may have a spare audio input socket, which you can plug your scanner into. If not then there are adapters available, which fit into the cassette compartment and allow you to listen to your Ipod or MP3 player via the car speakers. It can also be used for listening to your scanner. Great for helping to pass the time on a long journey.

6) Who uses VHF and UHF communications?

There are nowadays a great number of uses for spectrum at VHF and UHF frequencies, so much so that there is considerable pressure to utilise spectrum more efficiently than in the past. For example, the UHF television channel plan dates back to the 1960s, when plans for the introduction of colour television were being prepared. This was at a time when there were few other uses for the UHF spectrum. Not only are there now more uses, but many of these are potentially quite intensive as regards bandwidth, and so various methods of optimising bandwidth usage have been devised, such as trunking, time division multiple access (TDMA), such as that employed by digital mobile telephones, and multiplexing such as is used by digital audio broadcasting or DAB. In the civil aviation band, the channel spacing was reduced by a factor of three from 25KHz to 8 1/3 KHz, so that existing spot allocations could be maintained. This is just about the absolute minimum bandwidth required for AM voice communications.
Even radio amateurs, recognising a need to be seen to optimise their own use of bandwidth, changed from 25KHz spacing within the two meter band to 12.5KHz – the 25KHz spacing dates to a time when it was more difficult to design transmitters with the required frequency stability. Certainly nowadays, the use of 50 kHz of spectrum for a single repeater contact would not be tolerated in any other service.

An in depth list of frequency allocations may be found at the end of this book. For the rest of this section, I will describe the main users of the radio spectrum from 25MHz up to 2.5 GHz or so.

Amateur Radio

Not to be confused with CB or citizens' band, amateur radio is very much a hobby based on the science behind radio. In order to obtain a licence one has to pass an examination, which demonstrates the necessary level of competence to operate responsibly – after all, the consequences of interference to other services can be very serious.
In recent years, a foundation and intermediate licence has been introduced which allow easier entry to the hobby, albeit with more restricted operating conditions for beginner and intermediate users. Radio amateurs are allocated bands throughout the radio spectrum, from 135KHz to 248 GHz, and unlike other services, radio amateurs are allowed to use a multitude of different transmission modes besides voice, and there are even satellite relay stations allowing worldwide contacts to be made between any two parts of the earth where the satellite is above the horizon. The site www.heavens-above.com provides a tool, which actually predicts when amateur (and other) satellites will pass above the horizon in a given location. Here is a screenshot of a listing of amateur satellites:

Some of these can even be received using a handheld scanner at the right time, although most will require a higher gain aerial which may take some expertise to set up, so maybe not for the newcomer to the hobby. There are many other satellites, which can be received, which are also catered for by this site, and which I will come to later.

Another specialised aspect of this hobby is ATV or amateur television. It is possible to transmit black and white images on the 70cm band (430 to 440 MHz), although most activity lies on 23cm and up. ATV is one example of a wideband video signal, which can be received by a suitably equipped scanner hobbyist.
To this can be added data transmissions including fax, radio teletype (RTTY) and packet, and a recent addition to the hobby is echolink which uses voice over IP (VIOP) to link repeater stations around the world. This I often think of as ‘the poor man’s HF’.
Voice transmissions are almost exclusively SSB on HF and below (on amateur bands, LSB below 10MHz, USB above this, by convention) and FM on VHF and up. Marine and aeronautical services use USB on all HF bands.

I first gained my own licence over 10 years ago and have been active in the hobby on and off since. If you would like to learn more about the hobby, a good starting point would be a visit to the Radio Society of Great Britain, at www.rsgb.org.uk. Of course, you can also learn about the hobby by listening. The repeaters on 2 meters (144 to 146 MHz) and 70 centimetres (430 – 440 MHz) can be received easily and are most used during the ‘drive time’ during the week and on Sundays as well. Indeed, it was listening to local radio amateurs that first gave me the encouragement to take my Radio Amateurs’ Examination in order to gain my licence.

These are the bands allocated to amateur radio. Those up to the 13cm (2.3GHz) band can be monitored by scanners, depending on the coverage of the model in question.

Citizens' Band

Another way in which people 'graduate' to amateur radio is via CB, although the etiquette does require that some certain 'bad habits' are unlearnt! CB first started in the US in the 1970s, but was not legalised until 1981 here in the UK. Due to the convenience of mobile phones, it has lost popularity - but nonetheless, has a hard core of users such as farmers, haulers and various other business users, besides a few community groups in more remote parts of the country. In London, a number of people studying for their radio amateurs' license can be heard chatting about studying for the exam on the CB.
Unfortunately, CB has developed rather a bad reputation since the language can be somewhat colourful to say the least!
In the UK, only FM transmissions up to 4 watts in power on the prescribed channels is permitted, although there are a number of stations regularly heard running SSB within the 27MHz range. The CB channels can be found between 26.965 and 27.405 MHz (for the CEPT band) or 27.60125 to 27.99125 MHz for the UK channels. In both cases, channels are 10KHz apart. Note that those frequencies that are 'missing' from the sequence were left out because they were already allocated for model control, i.e. 26.995, 27.045, 27.095 & 27.145, 27.195 MHz. This is not a mistake in the table!

Also introduced in 1981 was the 934 MHz CB band, although usage was low due to the initial high cost of equipment, and UHF CB equipment was always very much a niche market. Since the UHF CB band had only a few thousand users at the peak of its usage, and by the early 1990s the 1 MHz of spectrum it occupied was much sought after for cellular telephone use, the band was withdrawn at the end of 1998. No new equipment had been manufactured since 1988, and surviving equipment has become the preserve of collectors. Proof (if any were needed) that hobbyists will always loose out to big business, hence I will take this as a perfect opportunity to promote activity on the amateur bands!

Civil Aviation

This area of the scanning hobby is unique, since here many enthusiasts are primarily interested in aircraft rather than scanning itself. But don't be fooled, this is a great pastime, particularly when a special event is on such as an air display, or when a piece of history is in the making, for example thousands tuned in to hear the last flight of Concorde in 2004. It is also an area, which the authorities tend to turn a blind eye to, so it shouldn't land you in any trouble so long as you are sensible.

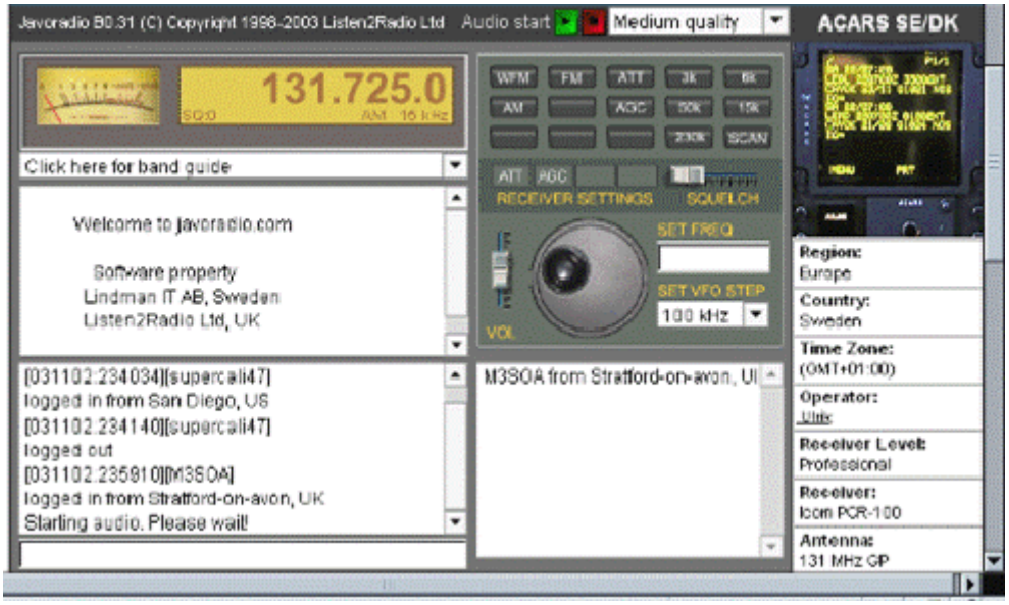
Pilots by necessity keep transmissions short and to the point.
Depending on their altitude, aircraft can contact ground stations up to 300-400 miles away; beyond this they go over to HF. On VHF, transmissions exclusively use AM on channels 8 1/3 KHz apart, making this service unique. On HF, USB is used within the aeronautical bands on channels 3KHz apart.
The VHF allocation extends from118 to 137 MHz, with beacons in the 108 to 118 MHz range, just above your FM broadcast dial. These are navigational aids, which transmit their identification in Morse code. These cannot be heard at great distances at ground level, but if you live near an airport you should find a carrier which is silent most of the time (and which may be mistaken for a birdie, so test by removing the aerial and noting whether the signal goes away), and have a periodic identifier say once a minute or so.
Small airports typically have only one or two frequencies, large airports such as Gatwick or Heathrow have multiple frequencies for departures, approach, tower, radar and so on, as well as others used by ground crews and maintenance personal. They also may have an aerodrome terminal information service carrying details about weather and runway conditions, along with any other information relevant to the usage of the airport at the time.
One aspect of the civil aviation communications not to be overlooked is ACARS, which stands for Aircraft Communications Addressing and Reporting System. Once feared to spell the end for airband listening, it can be easily decoded by a number of programs available for the PC, some of which allow you to monitor the progress of a flight in real time! This is a screenshot from Airnav tuned to the main downlink over Europe on 131.725MHz in, you've guessed it, AM mode.



One new product which has appeared quite recently is the virtual radar. This receives the ADSB (Automatic Dependent Surveillance Broadcast) signals from aircraft on 1090 MHz. These are navigational signals used by air traffic control to track the position of each aircraft in the vicinity in real time. The virtual radar receiver allows you to see all of the aircraft in range on your PC screen just as the air traffic controllers do! It also provides details of each aircraft displayed. The aircraft owner, registration and country are all displayed, even pictures of many aircraft are available. It is probably true that virtual radar receivers are the most important development in the plane spotting hobby in recent years. This is an example of a screenshot from the AirNav Radarbox (2008 version). An outside aerial designed for 1090 MHz will give the best results and greatest range.

Marine Radio

Near to the coast, you will hear intership and ship to shore traffic in the 156 to 163 MHz area. In this band you will hear ship-to-ship traffic, port operations, marine berthing, and, best of all, search and rescue operations. Channel 16 (156.8 MHz) is the distress and calling channel whereas channel 0 (156.0 MHz) is used by the coastguard and lifeboats during a search and rescue operation. Each port will also have it's own working channel.
Some channels within the band are reserved as 'private' channels and are used by freight companies and ferry operators, for example.
It is worth noting that whereas a few channels are simplex, requiring only a single frequency to be programmed, many are duplex with the shore station transmitting 4.6 MHz above the ship frequency. Your offset check button is invaluable here as it will allow you to quickly tune to the other side of the conversation without missing replies.
On certain channels, the coastguard makes marine safety information broadcasts, giving details including weather and navigation information, as well as any navigation warnings.

Channel 70 is reserved for digital selective calling (DSC) which allows text massages to be sent in lieu of voice messages. DSC transmissions sound rather like amateur packet, and probably use a similar type of coding.

PMR446

This service really is useful to a variety of people, ranging from retail staff to fruit pickers, from pub doorman to families hiking in the countryside. This service is licence exempt, and there are no restrictions on who may use it. Therefore, both business and recreational users can be found, as on CB radio. Channel sharing disputes can and do occur as would be expected in an unplanned service. In view of this, use of CTCSS is strongly recommended, although not compulsory. The standard 38 tones may be used. Channel spacing is 12.5 KHz with a 6.25 KHz offset. Ranges can vary from a few hundred yards in a built up area to three or four miles in flat open countryside. In fact there is even a group who DX on PMR446, and who over a line of sight path have greatly exceeded the quoted ranges. They are certainly an instant hit for children as their range makes them genuinely useful, unlike the toy 49MHz walkie-talkies with a range of perhaps 100 yards if you are very lucky indeed. They may be legally used in just about any country in the European Union, so they can be used to keep in touch when on holiday in the Costa Brava.

These are the frequencies used by PMR446.

Licence free Wireless Microphones

Radio microphones are used not only by major broadcasters, but also by a wide variety of individuals and groups who include local rock bands, churches, university lecturers and even secretaries as an aid in dictation. These operate in the 173 to 175 and 863 to 865 MHz ranges, and are low powered (< 10mW, up to 50mW if body worn) and of short range. The VHF microphone channels have been coded as follows for identification.

Frequency	Colour Code
173.8	Yellow
174.1	Red
174.5	Blue
174.8	Green
175.0	White

More serious users such as radio and television ground crews, as well as theatres, opt for licensed systems since they need higher powers and/or guaranteed freedom from co-channel interference. Also, at a large event there is great potential for intermodulation, so all frequencies have to be carefully co-ordinated. See the next section, Services Ancillary to Broadcasting.

Services Ancillary to Broadcasting

Program makers for both radio and television use a great deal of radio equipment, which includes various radio microphones, point-to-point links (for example, studio to transmitter), talkback (used to send cues to camera and sound crews during ‘at scene’ interviews). These operate at various frequencies at either VHF or UHF. Nationwide allocations can be found in the following ranges, all frequencies in MHz: 47.55 to 48.8, 52 to 52.95, 53.75 to 62.75, 141 to141.5, various spot frequencies in the band three area (174 – 225), 457.25 to 457.475, 461.2375, 467.2625 to 469.875, frequencies within the 470 to 854 MHz television band which are unused by television in the area in question, 854.2 to 862 and 2390 to 2490. There are other allocations available only on a regional basis, for example the 446.5125 to 447.5125 band is available only in certain counties due to military usage elsewhere, and 442.2625 to 442.5125 is available only in certain conurbations including Greater London. There are also various allocations up in the microwave spectrum, but these are out of the reach of an ordinary scanner. Some video links can be found in the 2.2 to 2.6 GHz region, although at time of writing the part of the band above 2.5 GHz is to be auctioned off.

Studio to transmitter links are wideband FM since they carry the full audio range for broadcast, as are most radio microphones, however talkback channels (or 'clean feeds' as they are known in the trade) are needed only for communication with crews on the ground and are narrowband since they do not need to be high fidelity.

To these can be added so called 'eye in the sky' links. These are usually duplex links to light aircraft or helicopters, which provide a birds eye view of events on the ground. Perhaps the most regular of these are the rush hour traffic reporting flights. The uplink is not too likely to be heard at ground level unless you live reasonably close to the studio, but the downlink from the aircraft has the advantage of altitude and can be heard over some tens of miles. In East Anglia many stations share a plane, and the downlinks can be heard on 468.74375 and 468.7875 MHz. For a comprehensive list of available SAB frequencies, see the website of JFMG, which deals with licensing for SAB frequencies. The specific document listing the available frequencies is here: http://www.jfmg.co.uk/pages/freq/PIN30_7%20Jan%202006.pdf

Audio Distribution Systems

These are not SAB systems as such; rather they have been recently licensed by Ofcom to distribute audio in 'real time' i.e., which is not pre-recorded. These operate in the 60.75 to 62.75 MHz band and are intended for use at special events, such as sporting events. Receivers will be sold on site, for use by spectators. For example, football fans would be able to hear the referee and his assistants during a game, and so will know why a goal is ruled offside or a player is booked as it happens, so we need speculate no longer! Due to the low power licensable, coverage would be restricted to the stadium and maybe its immediate vicinity. On the other hand, you couldn't see the action from outside anyway.

Transport

Besides the aviation and marine allocations previously discussed, some haulers, delivery firms, hire companies, taxi firms and couriers have spot frequency allocations on the VHF or UHF PBR allocations. Of possibly more interest are the trunked citywide bus/tram transport systems, which operate in Sub-band 2 in the area of the VHF spectrum known as band three, since this is television band three in most countries. These are MPT1327 trunked systems – more about this topic later. The base stations use the following frequencies with the mobiles transmitting 8 MHz lower in frequency.

Bus and tram operators are reserved the following frequencies in sub band two:

201.3125	201.3625	201.4125	201.5125	201.5625
201.6125	201.6625	201.7125	201.7625	201.8125

206.0625	2061125.	206.1625	206.2125	206.2625

These are usually used in major cities only, since small operators usually have one or two channels allocated to them. In London, London Transport busses, with a central control centre, which is known as Centrecom, use the above. Quite amusing at pub turnout times, particularly on Fridays and Saturdays. Note that in London, the busses are now gradually migrating to the new Ibus system operating in the 139.5 to 140.5 MHz band (formerly used by gas and electric utilities). Channels are 12.5 KHz apart with a 6.25 KHz offset, just like PMR446. The mobiles transmit 8.5 MHz higher in the 148 to 149 MHz range.

The railways have also got frequencies reserved for them in band three. The national rail network is a system, which allows train drivers to make a telephone call to any phone on the network rail internal telephone network.

In addition to the national rail network, there is also a localised system known as ‘cab secure’ since it is designed to let a controller communicate with only one driver at a given time, for safety reasons.

UK General Licence

This is a specialist PBR allocation, the two differences between this and standard PBR being that these channels can firstly be used only in simplex mode, and secondly, the user is not tied to any particular site. They are therefore free to travel with their radios, but must accept interference from other users. They are free to use any of the 38 standard CTCSS tones to reduce co-channel interference. There are fifteen channels available.

Private Business Radio

This is the standard licensed service, which is planned to keep co-channel interference to the absolute minimum possible. The service (unlike the General Licence above, or PMR446) is planned so that users are guaranteed access to the channel at any given time. Licences come in three variants, and these are allocated channels from four pools.

The On-site licence is for users requiring coverage of a site with a range up to 3 kilometres. Site security, shop and pub watch schemes, as well as hospital porters; university campus staff and so on use this. Base stations are typically located on a building.

The general licence is used for longer-range applications. For example, courier and taxi firms, as well as security firms for whom operation is across multiple sites in a city may have general licences. Base stations are at high locations and use greater power than those for site licence holders.

Common base stations are run by communications companies who rent time on them to a number of companies needing radio communications in a local area. Typically, each user is given their own CTCSS tone so that they are not disturbed by each other's transmissions. This arrangement is more spectrum efficient than each having their own frequency allocated. These are wide area services.

There are also frequencies set aside for short-term hire companies, which hire out equipment for a period of up to a year. It is worth having a list of these frequencies since short-term hire equipment is often used at public events. Many outdoor events during the summer such as music or beer festivals will have stewards using radios from a hire company. They do not require a licence since they are covered by the hire company who themselves are licensed. If you program these into a memory bank you may then scan these until you find the one or more frequencies in use. Remember, in the case of annual events, the actual frequencies will probably be different from year to year since the equipment supplied is likely to vary. The frequencies for general hire are as follows:

General allocations are those which are not set-aside for any particular type of licence holder, but rather are allocated on a 'per case' basis. There are often a number of users who may either have non-standard requirements, or who cannot be allocated one of the standard channels set aside for their application due to limited capacity. In this case they may be fitted in where a spare general use channel is available in their area.

Finally, there are national allocations. For example, the three station channels allocated to Network Rail are licensed for their exclusive use countrywide. Also, organisations such as the gas, electricity and water services, the AA and RAC and the RSPCA are examples of national licence holders.

The main national bands allocated for PBR are known as the VHF low, VHF mid, VHF High and UHF. There are also some allocations, which lie outside of these ranges. Since there are quite a number of allocations, each deploying different separations between the base and mobile frequencies, so a table is provided as an appendix.

Radio Paging

Now that SMS text messaging has been around for some years, one would have thought that paging would have had its day? Well, not so far. As you may well be aware, paging systems can be either a blessing or a curse. Being very high power affairs, the transmissions can cause real headaches by overloading the input stages of your scanner. On the other hand, paging messages can be decoded using suitable software and interfacing to your PC.

Firstly, I will explain the various types of paging system and what the potential yield will be for a scanner enthusiast. Remember that there are a variety of paging systems in use, some of which adhere to well known standards such as POCSAG and FLEX, and there are also proprietary systems using a specialised type of signalling. Wide area public services are generally of standard types whereas Private local systems can be either standard or specialised types.

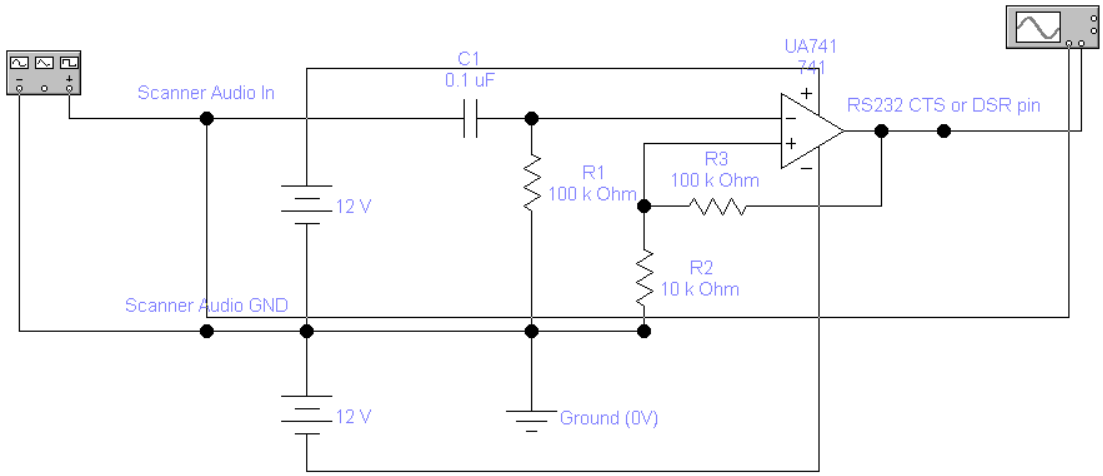
For starters, there are numeric only pagers. These transmissions will carry only lists of numbers such as the extension number of the person sending the message, which is hardly very interesting. But alphanumeric paging can carry some very interesting messages, which are easily readable.
There are also voice paging systems in use, which can be monitored, however there is no way on a scanner to screen out the deafening activation tones, which the pager's own circuitry filters out; the filtering circuit is in effect a squelch system.

As well as the national paging networks operated by communications companies, there are also both On Sitepaging systems which are low powered and intended to serve only a single site but which can often be received some distance away, and private wide area systems which for example may have ranges up to approximately 12 to 15 miles from the site, so staff may be contacted anywhere within the local area. For example, Cambridge University has such a system, which operates up to twelve miles from the centre of Cambridge on 153.475 MHz. Many fire brigades have wide area systems on 153.05 MHz, including the London Fire Brigade.

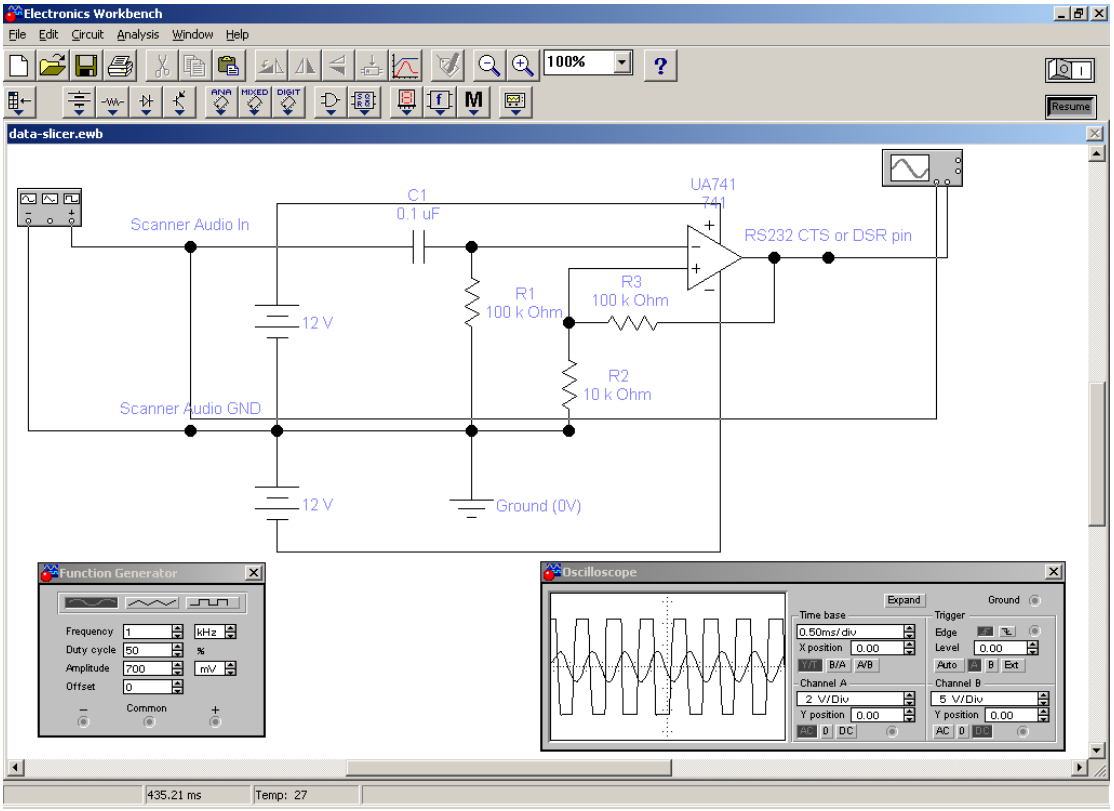
It is important to remember that although there are paging standards such as POCSAG and FLEX, for which there are decoder programs available, there are also many systems which use proprietary encoding schemes. Fortunately, since these all sound different on air, it is possible to distinguish between them without difficulty, since sound samples are available.

One of the first paging decoders available was called PD although this ran only under DOS and so cannot run on modern Windows systems. However, its performance is excellent as it is much easier to set up, as far as configuration is concerned. The only drawback is that since it receives data via the serial port, a circuit called a data slicer is needed to interface your scanner to the PC. If you have an old DOS PC then it could be given a new lease of life. This decodes POCSAG, which is the original paging protocol, only.

I have included a circuit diagram which can be built at minimal cost, on Veroboard using components which can be obtained from your local Maplin store or another local retailer who stocks electronic components. This was modelled using a program called Electronics' Workbench from Interactive Image Technologies, which allows you to build and simulate a 'virtual circuit' – which is excellent if you have not got the full range of test equipment.



To understand the operation of this, see the simulation output below. The output from your scanner will be similar to a sine wave only more complex, with amplitude of up to say 200 to 300 mV. Firstly, your computer's serial port handles only a square wave input and secondly, amplitude of up to ±12V is needed. The data slicer is able to convert the audio output from the scanner into a form, which your computers serial port can handle, and also prevents any output voltages from the computer from reaching your scanner!



In this test, a function generator is used to demonstrate the operation of the circuit, using a signal generator to provide a sine input (the output of your scanner tuned to a paging transmission will be a series of modulated sine waves). The oscilloscope provides a comparison of the input and output waveforms.

The pin connections for the serial port are as follows:

Label	25 Pin Version	9 Pin Version
CTS	5	8
GND	7	5
TXD	2	3
RTS	4	7
DTR	20	4
DSR	6	6

So the ground from both the scanner and the data slicer need to be connected to pin 7 for a 25-way connection, or pin 5 for a 5 way connection; output from the slicer needs to be connected to be connected to pin 6.

IF you are uncertain which core of your cable is which, note the pin number for each and then test for the core in question with a multimeter. The pin numbers appear in the face of the connector next to each hole.

Incidentally, the above circuit is also of use for decoding some other data modes, which are discussed later on.

A more recent program for decoding POCSAG and other data protocols is called POC32 and runs under Windows. It also decodes FLEX as well. My own personal favourite is called PDW. Besides POGSAC and FEX paging it also decodes ERMES (a paging standard used in many European Union countries plus others around the world), however there are no ERMES networks in the UK. It also can decode ACARS and a data standard called Mobitex, which in the UK can be found between 453 and 453.5 MHz, and has a distinctive 'crunching' sound. It is utilised by mobile data terminals.

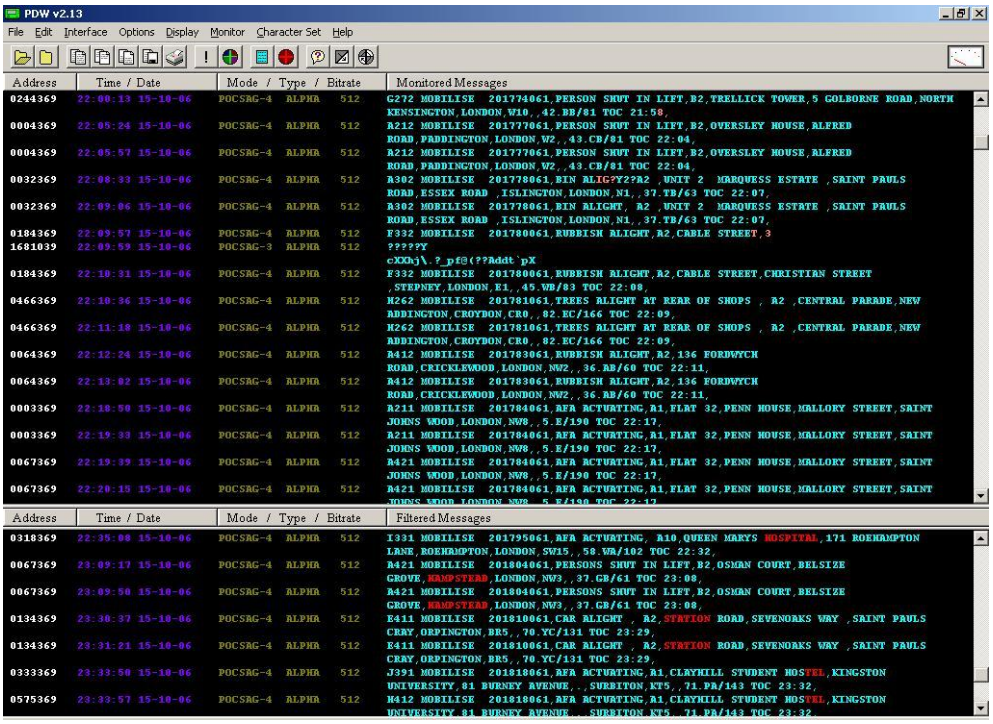
This is a screenshot of PDW decoding a POCSAG fire brigade system.



You can set up a filter so that only messages containing certain keywords are displayed in the lower pane and logged.
Both PDW and POC32 allow you to interface the scanner to the PC using the soundcard. However unless your scanner has a discriminator output you cannot decode transmissions at higher data rates. Also, even for lower data rates, it is essential to set up the volume level correctly for decoding to succeed. But it's well worth the effort! Be sure to consult the help file though as it may save you a great deal of wasted time.

Here are the details of paging systems in use in the United Kingdom.

NON-SPEECH on-site paging (not hospitals):

All of the channels in this category may be used for non-speech paging, which can be tone-only or with numeric and/or alphanumeric messaging.

26MHz Band

26.2375	26.4100	26.4375	26.4625	26.5450	26.5880	26.6155
26.6695	26.7255	26.8155	26.8650	26.8655

49MHz Band

49.0000	49.0125	49.0250	49.0375	40.0500	49.0625	49.0750
49.0875	49.1000	49.1125	49.1250	49.1375	49.1500	49.1625
49.1750	49.1875	49.2000	49.2125	49.2250	49.2375	49.2500
49.2625	49.2750	49.2875	49.3000	49.3125	49.3250	49.3375
49.3500	49.3625	49.3750	49.3875	49.4000	49.4125	49.4875

These are 12.5kHz channel spacing.

459MHz Band

459.050 459.100

These are 25kHz channel spacing.

One-way on-site paging with speech permitted.

All of the channels in this category may be used for on-site paging in non-hospital systems and can be with speech and/or numeric and/or alphanumeric messaging as required. These channels are also shared with Local Communications two-way speech systems.

459.1250	459.1500	459.1750	459.2000	459.2250	459.2500	459.2750
459.3000	459.3500	459.4500

These are 25kHz channel spacing.

Hospital paging systems

All of these channels are allocated specifically for use in hospitals and both one-way and two-way speech is permitted for emergencies. Tone only paging and numeric and/or alphanumeric message paging may also be used.

31MHz band

31.7250 31.7500 31.7750

These are 25kHz channel spacing.

49MHz band

49.4250 49.4375 49.4500 49.4625 49.4750

These are 12.5kHz channel spacing

Talkback (return speech) frequencies (any talkback frequency may be used with any paging frequency).

Note that the use of Talkback is only permitted in emergency situations.

161.0000 161.0250 161.0500 161.0750 161.1000 164.2000

These frequencies are 12.5kHz channel spacing for new systems.

Short Range Business Paging

There are two UHF frequencies available for Short Range Business Paging. This is a non-speech paging service with low output power and limited range.

Local Communications (Speech paging with talkback)

All of the channels in this category may be used for on-site paging in non-hospital systems, with speech and talkback and/or numeric and/or alphanumeric messaging as required. These are two-frequency channels in three groups, as detailed below. Channels in Groups B and C below are shared with one-way speech paging.

Paging (459MHz) frequencies are all 25 kHz channel spacing and talkback (159-164 MHz) frequencies are all 12.5kHz channel spacing for new systems. Some older existing systems using the 161 MHz frequencies have 25kHz channel spacing for talkback.

Group A - These channels have fixed pairings of paging and talkback frequencies that cannot be varied.

459.3250 / 161.0125	459.3750 / 161.0375	459.4000 / 161.0625
459.4250 / 161.0875	459.4750 / 161.1125

Group B - The pairings shown are preferred but any paging frequency may be used with any talkback frequency. 164.2000MHz talkback frequency may be used with any paging frequency in the group.

459.1750 / 159.6375	459.2000 / 159.6500	459.2250 / 159.6625
459.2750 / 159.6750	459.3000 / 159.7000	* / 164.2000

Group C - The pairings shown are preferred but any paging frequency may be used with any talkback frequency. 164.2000MHz talkback frequency may be used with any paging frequency in the group.

459.1250 / 161.0000	459.1500 / 161.0250	459.2500 / 161.0500
459.3500 / 161.0750	459.4500 / 161.1000	* / 164.2000

6. Private Wide Area Paging

There are channels available at VHF and UHF for Private Wide Area Paging. Speech is only permitted on the UHF channels.

VHF Paging Channels (153MHz Band)

153.3750	153.4000	153.4250	153.4500	153.4750

These are 25kHz channel spacing.

UHF Paging Channels (454MHz band, and 466MHz band)

The available UHF Private Wide Area Paging Channels are:

454.0250	454.0500	454.0750	454.1000	454.1250	454.1500	454.1750
454.2500	454.2750	454.3000	454.3250	454.3500	454.7000	454.7750

These are 25 kHz channel spacing.

The normal maximum permitted power for Private Wide Area paging transmitters is 25 watts ERP.

Religious Observance Frequencies

It is worth mentioning that the above frequencies in the 454 MHz band are now shared with 'call to prayer' systems. This is quite a new allocation and a very unusual one. Although any religious group can apply for a licence, in practice mosques normally use it. In Islamic countries, people are called to prayer using loudhailers, however since this is not practical here, a radio-based system is used instead. Although frequencies throughout the 454 to 454.85 MHz band have been used, users have been encouraged to retune to the four preferred official frequencies, 454.39375, 454.40625, 454.79375 and 454.80625 MHz. In some areas, notably London, some other spot frequencies are still used as both mosques and wide area paging systems are numerous and the band is somewhat congested. Range is nominally 3km although applications for longer ranges are considered. This points to about 1 watt of radiated power, similar to site PBR base stations. The full list of channels is as follows:

The Emergency Services

Were you to ask a sample of enthusiasts why they bought their first scanner they will tell you that like their counterparts across the pond, they wanted to hear their local emergency services in action. Be it the ambulance service responding to a 999 call in your town, the fire service dealing with a fire or motorway pileup, or the police chasing a stolen car or maybe a petty criminal attempting to flee the scene a few streets from you, the emergency services have long been a favourite. After all, the media will report the incidents if they are sufficiently, noteworthy - but with a scanner you can follow events as they unfold! You may also be able to discover the cause of a traffic jam ahead of time, that is before you become entrapped and are made late for work!

The ambulance service have channels within the PBR high band from 166.1 to 166.7 MHz, with the mobiles transmitting 4.8 MHz higher as is the standard offset in this band. Smaller counties manage full coverage with a single base site, with a typical county having two or three. London is divided into several due not so much to distance as to the population density. For example, the central area is co-ordinated by 'white' control. As well as voice transmission, many ambulance services make use of mobile data terminals to which details of jobs are sent.

The fire service has two main bands available to them. The 70.5 to 71.5 MHz band is used for countywide VHF coverage using normally one to two frequencies. These mostly use AM with a 12.5KHz channel spacing. The mobiles transmit around 80 MHz, although the splits do vary from one county to another, and even between channels in the same service. The fire brigades also have a UHF allocation in the 457 to 457.25 MHz bands, which are used to provide handheld coverage to specific areas. Also, some links exist in this band. In Cambridgeshire for example, 457.1375 MHz is used to relay the VHF channel on 71.425 MHz to handhelds in both Peterborough and Cambridge at each end of the county.
There are also links some areas in the 146 to 148, 152 to 153 and 154 to 156 MHz bands, which are shared with police channels.

The police are similar to the fire services in that most county forces have (or did have) a force wide VHF scheme in the 154 to 156 MHz bands (mostly AM) and a UHF scheme covering specific areas, typically a town. The 'bobbies on the beat' used handhelds in the UHF band and the in car officers using the VHF scheme. The UHF base stations transmitting in the 450 to 453 MHz band, with the handhelds transmitting 14 MHz higher for bases stations from 450-451 MHz, and 13.9 MHz higher for bases in the 451 to 453 MHz range.
At VHF, most forces mobiles transmitted in the 146 to 148MHz range, although with the Metropolitan police in London and a handful of others operating bases in the 152 MHz range and mobiles in the 143 to 144 MHz area. However, nearly all police communications have, at time of writing, now migrated to Airwave TETRA, which is impossible to monitor due to the advanced encryption employed.

Mountain Rescue Services

These have dedicated frequencies in the VHF low band, as well as one air search and rescue frequency in the civil aviation band, and one private marine frequency. All of these are simplex channels.

Channel	Mode	Usage
84.6000	NFM	Channel 0
86.3125	NFM	Channel 1
86.4125	NFM	Channel 2
86.3500	NFM	Channel 3
86.3250	NFM	Channel 4
123.100	AM	Air Search & Rescue
158.650	NFM	Marine Auxiliary

As mentioned, the vast majority of the police forces now exclusively use the Airwave system, which is based in the TETRA standard (standing for Trans European Trunked Radio), European standard, which operates in the 380 to 400 MHz area and which cannot be monitored. This is because it is a wholly digital system, which uses strong encryption. In fact even the control channels are encrypted. This has come about largely in response to criminals increasingly listening in to police transmissions, besides other perceived shortcomings in existing police radios.
At time of writing, the London Metradio has just ceased operation, which was a Motorola Smartzone system commonly used in the United States. Smartzone is also used by the police and fire service in Staffordshire. Smartzone and other trunked systems, particularly MPT1327 systems making up the vast majority of trunked systems in the UK are discussed later on.

The other emergency services have so far held out against government pressure to join Airwave also, due to the fact that the system is very expensive and most services would have preferred less costly alternatives. So although almost all are still on analogue this is unlikely to be the case in five to ten years time.
Besides, the police, fire and ambulance services, and HM coastguard, there are a number of other services allowed to use Airwave, but so far, most have shown a great deal of reluctance to join.

UK Prisons

For some reason (possibly due to the previous shortage of available channels in the 450 to 453 MHz band in some parts of the country), many of the prison frequencies are within the 450 MHz band whereas others can be found between 460.5 and 461 MHz. Those in the 450 MHz band use the standard 13.9 or 14 MHz split, whereas the 460 MHz channels have a mobile split of +6.5MHz. Some, but not all, of these use CTCSS.

Military

The military are by far the largest user of spectrum in terms of the bandwidth they are allocated. Although not all of this is exclusively military, there are many shared bands. For example, the 70 centimetre amateur band is a shared band with the military, and the 440 to 450 MHz regions just above this are shared with commercial users. This is possible simply because commercial activity is centred on towns and cities, whereas military operations are mainly based in the country. This gives rise to the PBR and SAB allocations, which are available only in certain areas of the country. The main areas in which there are military allocations are as follows.

Tactical channels can be found from 29.7 to 29.97 MHz where you may on occasion catch exercises if you live near a training area.

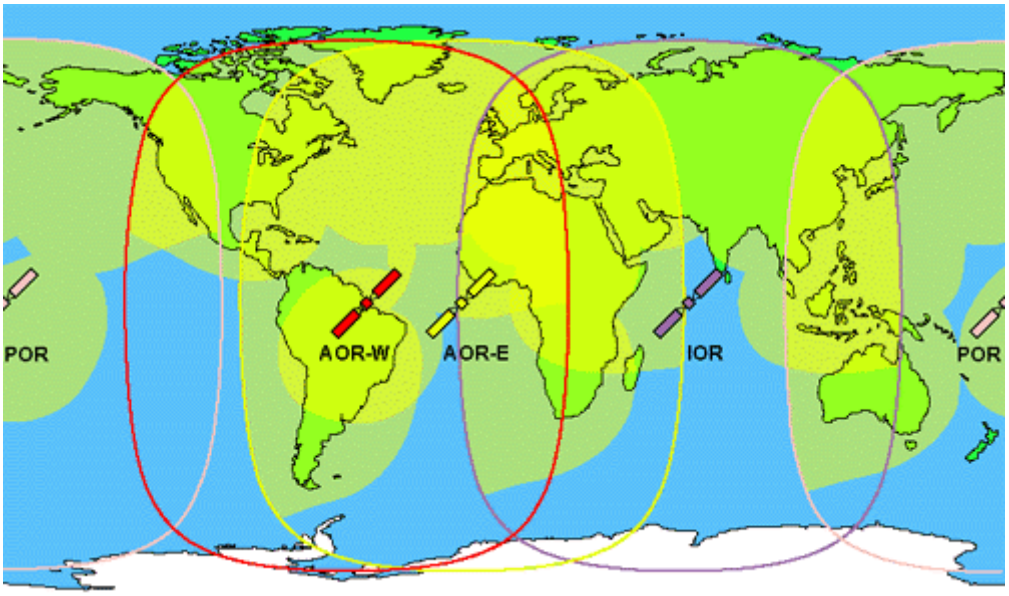
30.025 to 31.7 MHz with gaps such as that just above 31Mhz used by cordless telephones since 1998, are used by US Air Force base security personal. The US military have also used this are for transport communications in continental Europe, but rarely in the UK. MOD and US Air force communications can also be found in the 31.8 to 34.9, 35.25 to 37.75, 37.9 to 40.1, 41 to 46.6, 54 to 60, 64 to 69.8, and 72.8 to 73.925 MHz bands. The MOD police are to be found in the latter. 77.8 to 79 MHz is shared with outside broadcast links, and 79 to 80MHz is home to the RAF police also besides other ground operations. Army range, close protection and mountain rescue operations can be found in the 84 to 85 MHz area. The level of activity varies widely with your location, of course. But the above should net you something during exercises if you live near a training area.

The military aviation band extends from 225 to 400 MHz (the 380 to 400 MHz slice now in use by TETRA; spot frequencies used in a given area are exempted from TETRA usage). Transmissions in this band are very short and to the point, so listening will require your full attention.

Throughout this band, the channel spacing is 25KHz in AM mode. In this band the levels of activity can vary widely. Sometimes you can search for hours and receive nothing much at all; at other times when exercises are taking place you will have more luck. Another occasion on which this band comes into it's own is during an air display. Famous display teams such as the Red Arrows and the USAF display tem all have well known frequencies.

During normal operations, you will sometimes hear routine flight traffic control and more specialised operations not performed by civil aircraft such as air-to-air refuelling. Obviously during actual times of conflict activity levels go up dramatically, as was the case during the war in the Balkans, Afghanistan and Iraq, when US aircraft were refuelled over the UK en route to their destination. During the Balkan conflict, those in adjoining countries were given a rare insight into the logistics of war. The actual operations sound very like those carried out during an exercise, except of course that the weapons are armed and the targets are for real.

Besides aircraft communications, there are also the US air force satellite downlinks, which use narrowband FM (and a small number of wideband FM) downlinks. It is occasionally possible to just about catch an occasional transmission using a standard co-linear type aerial, although its pointless trying unless you live in a very quiet RF environment, and have a sensitive scanner. For the most part, you will need to build a dedicated high gain aerial giving 10 to 20dB gain to reliably hear these. The satellites in question are the Marisat, Afsatcom and Fleetsatcom geostationary satellites. If you are interested in Satcomm reception see http://www.uhf-satcom.com where some enthusiasts have an excellent site with a wealth of information. Fleetsatcomm covers just about the entire globe except for the Polar Regions, with Fleetsatcomm West best covering Britain. This is a coverage map for Fleetsatcomm satellites:



You can also gain some insight into the groundside of operations by listening in the 408 to 418 MHz areas, where numerous airbase ground frequencies can be found. For example, at RAF Mildenhall (actually a US Air force base) a Motorolla Smartzone trunked system is in use, which can be monitored up to twenty miles or so from the base.

Some satellites are popular enough for monitoring that on occasion commercial aerials, designed for the specific frequencies in question, are available. For example, Walters & Stanton stock the SHF-1633 Yagi aerial, offering 16.3 dB gain, for receiving metosat in the 1690-1700 Mhz range. See the section on weather satellites for more details.

Telephones

Let us avoid any possible cause for confusion. Firstly, mobile telephones. All mobile telephones in the United Kingdom have been digital since the last analogue network was switched off on May 31st, 2001. The second-generation GSM phones operate in the 872 to 960 MHz and 1710 to 1880 MHz bands. As the transmissions are not only digital but also encrypted, you cannot monitor them as could be easily done in the days of analogue cellular telephones. All you will hear is a similar sound to computer hash. The third generation phones use a system called WCDMA (which stands for Wideband Code Division Multiple Access). Here the base stations transmit in the 2110 to 2170 MHz range with the phones themselves transmitting in the 1900 to 1970 MHz range. Even if your scanner can tune this high you cannot actually hear a WCDMA signal since the channels are 5 MHz wide and in any case will sound similar to random white noise. The WCDMA operates in such a way that each phone can transmit at low level throughout a 5MHz channel, with a unique 128 bit identifying number called a spreading code. This allows the base station to distinguish between individual phones. As all phones on the channel transmit simultaneously, their power output is constantly adjusted so as all phones' signals arrive at the same strength. It is the wideband nature of the WCDMA system that allows for high-speed data throughput.

As you can imagine, scanner enthusiasts will probably never again monitor cellular telephone conversations.

The cordless telephones (which operate in the vicinity of a small base station and which doubles as the charging unit) come in two varieties. The newer (and more expensive) CT2 and DECT telephones cannot be monitored since they too encrypt their voice data. The CT2 phones (which were expected to also be used in a service in which public base stations in such places as motorway service stations and shopping malls could be used by the handsets to place calls, but which proved not to be commercially viable, however CT2 phones are to be found in offices and a few homes), operate in the 864.15 to 868.05 MHz range. The DECT phones operate in the 1881 to 1898 MHz range.

However, analogue cordless telephones can easily be monitored provided you know where to tune. Older analogue cordless telephones operate in the 1.7MHz and 47.5MHz areas (see below) whereas the newer 1998 allocation use 31 and 39 MHz. The newer 31/39 MHz allocation not only offered better range and quality to the user, but has extended the range over which a scanner equipped with a reasonable aerial can receive them! Here are the channels on which they operate.

Base (Old)	Handset (Old)	Base (New)	Handset (New)
1.642	47.45625	31.0375	39.9375
1.662	47.46875	31.0625	39.9625
1.682	47.48125	31.0875	39.9875
1.702	47.49375	31.1125	40.0125
1.722	47.50625	31.1377	40.0375
1.742	47.51875	31.1625	40.0625
1.762	47.53125/47.44375	31.1875	40.9875
1.782	47.54375	31.2125	40.1125

The older handsets used an alternative frequency of 47.44375 where problems were caused by a harmonic of the base station causing interference. Incidentally, whereas older phones used the same pair of frequencies all of the time, newer units automatically select a free channel in that location at that time. This is to minimise problems with co-channel interference, which were all too common with older equipment.

Baby Monitors

These are often left switched on for months at a time. These, like cordless telephones have quoted ranges of 100-200 metres, although their own receivers are not too sensitive, nor are the aerials awfully efficient. However, A sensitive scanner with a high-gain aerial can receive these an astonishing distance away (perhaps more than a mile, in the absence of co-channel interference).

Ordinary audio monitors operate in the 49.83 to 49.98 MHz range where a small band exists for general low power devices. By default, most manufacturers have adopted a 15 KHz channel spacing, although there are exceptions. Also in this band can be found a few remote controlled toys (the majority however use dedicated model control frequencies), toy walkie talkies with a similar range to the distance one could throw them, and a few other devices besides).

Video baby monitors operate in the 2.4 GHz ISM band – more about the subject of video monitoring later on.
There are also monitors, which use DECT, operating primarily in the 2.4GHz band. These cannot be monitored since DECT is encrypted. The encryption scheme has never been published, but presumably it is the same as is in use by DECT cordless phones.

Broadcast Radio and Television

Apart from the HF broadcast bands below 25 MHz, broadcasting can be found in two bands, 88 to 108 MHz which is your familiar FM radio dial, and 470 to 855 MHz which is the UHF television broadcast band.

Although this is not what one actually buys a scanner to listen to, it is sometimes useful to be able to listen to say the news or sport coverage without needing to take a separate radio for this purpose alone. To listen to FM radio stations, simply tune from 88 to 108 MHz in 100 KHz steps and in wideband FM mode. For television, you can't of course see the video unless you have an Icom IC-R3, but can listen to the audio. What for? Well, there are three reasons really. Firstly, you will be amazed at the scanners' sensitivity compared to your TV set. Since the technical requirements for receiving audio (even in wideband FM mode) are a great deal lower than for acquiring a watchable picture, you may find that most of the TV channels 21 to 68 are occupied where you live, even though your television will pick up only channels local to you (BBC1, BBC2, ITV1, Channel 4 and Channel 5 broadcast on analogue). You may well find that you can for example, listen in to the regional news from one or more BBC or ITV regions other than your own. For example, on the Northern fringes of Cambridge and across the Fens I could easily receive Yorkshire Television, whilst on the Isle of Wight the Southwest BBC and ITV channels as well as BBC southeast and, on occasion, Meridian and ITV London can be heard. Obviously, analogue television in the UK is to be switched off between 2008 and 2012, so you won't be able to do this forever.

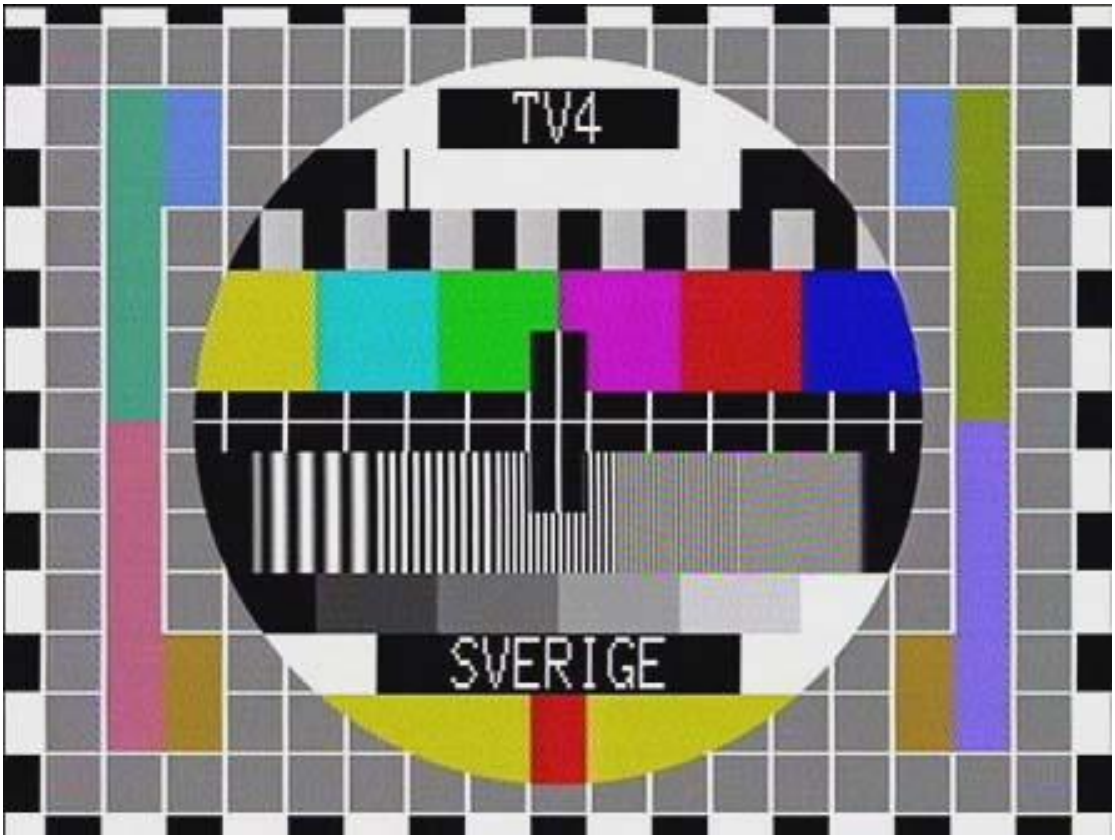
Secondly, DX from the continent can be very interesting. In many European countries television is still broadcast in bands 1 and 3 (VHF 46 to 88 and 174 to 230 MHz respectively), as well as bands 4 and 5 (470 to 614 and 615 to 855).

For DX in band 1, a mode of propagation known as 'sporadic E', which appears at intervals in late spring to late summer, can on occasion allow you to receive stations from hundreds and even more rarely thousands of miles away! On band three as well as UHF, long distance reception is mainly due to tropospheric ducting, where a stationary cool air layer which is denser than the air above it ducts signals over the horizon which normally obstructs them. It is this, which makes TV presenters, tell you not to adjust your set – the extra range results in co-channel interference between transmitters which are normally out of range of each other. This can happen at any time of year when the British Isles are under an intense area of high pressure, which prevents any wind which would normally disperse the cold air layer near the ground. So when you suffer co-channel interference on your TV set, have a go at Dxing! Once upon a time test cards made channel identification easy if you had an older TV, which could tune VHF or UHF channels, although sadly these test cards are rare nowadays. I can however recall even seeing a 'Nederland 3' test card on a pocket television during a tropospheric ducting night in July 1994! An example of a test card from Sweden is shown below.
On a scanner, the only way to identify the country is by the language spoken. On amateur television, test cards are still used – see the section on video monitoring.



Thirdly, you may use a map of main transmitters and the VHF or UHF channel numbers they use to serve as a guide to propagation. So if you want to try to receive stations of any type on your scanner which are normally beyond your listening range when Sporadic E or tropospheric ducting are likely to be present, try tuning in to known TV channels - UHF only for the UK, VHF or UHF for the continent; they can serve as a good indication of likely source areas for other types of signal you may receive. Also, don't forget that the amateur bands at VHF and UHF may be more active than usual at such times!

These are the television channels for the United Kingdom and other European countries. Note that the channel frequencies below 100 MHz are in television band 1, band three makes up the VHF channels above 100 MHz. (Band two is the FM broadcasting band. Note that Russia and the other former eastern bloc used a different allocation to ours). Note that bands 1 and 3 have not been used for television in the UK for many years. These carried the old 405 line black & white only television, the last of which closed in January 1985.

The bands 4 & 5 Channels carry the 625-line colour television, which was originally introduced in 1966. It is worth noting that all of the countries use the PAL system (Phase Alternate Line) with the notable exception of France, which uses the SECAM standard. All the audio transmissions are in wideband FM except for France, which uses AM. Another point to note is that whereas the UK and other Western European countries except France share the same video frequency in bands 4 & 5, however the UK has the audio carrier 6 MHz above the video whereas the other countries have the audio 5.5 MHz above the video. Which explains why if you take a set which is intended to be used in the UK to another west European country, you will find that unless the tuning circuit is adjusted, you can only tune in the picture or the sound at once! But for DX purposes, it's a great help since any audio carrier having a frequency ending in .75 has to be from abroad – and UK audio carriers won't overpower it.

It is worth noting that the UHF channels are 'grouped', owing to the fact that wideband television aerials (group K) are of a log periodic design, which, although being genuinely wideband in terms of performance (if well designed), and offering good directional properties, has relatively little gain, which can be an issue in weaker signal areas or where ghosting is a problem. A grouped equivalent aerial will give more gain. For this reason, television transmitter sites endeavour to provide all channels in a single channel group, so that a single grouped aerial should provide reception for all channels. This also allowed retailers to stock only aerials suitable for use in their area.

At least, that was true until Channel Five came on air in 1997. Since the band was, for intents and purposes full, channel Five had to be 'slotted in' anywhere possible, even if this meant using a transmission channel well outside the local group. This lead to complaints from installers who found themselves in the thankless position of having to use wideband aerials, even if this meant their customers having to accept less than optimal reception of the other channels! A related problem concerned the output signals from devices including CCTV cameras, video recorders and cable and satellite receivers. Previously, channels 35 to 38 had been reserved for this purpose, however, Channel 5 could often not be accommodated elsewhere in the UHF band, and so this meant having to use channels 34 to 38, even though it meant having to retune numerous devices to avoid interference, at quite considerable cost. Even so, some parts of the country were left without channel 5 provision since there was not a free channel available which would not suffer from co-channel interference. Notably, main transmitter sites near the south coast, and low powered relay stations could not provide channel five for this reason. The channel groups are as follows:

Group	Channels Included
A	21 – 34 (Performance falls off significantly above channel 34)
B	39 – 53 (Channels 35 to 38 not used until Channel 5)
C/D	48 – 68
E	39 – 68 (Channel 69 not used for television in the UK)
K	21 – 68 (Wideband)

Hopefully, the above will provide some insight as to why attempting to use your TV aerial for wideband scanner reception is a rather poor idea! Not only is it unsuitable in terms of its frequency coverage, but you also have at least a 50% chance of the polarisation being wrong anyhow.

7) Trunked Radio Networks

I have already made a number of references to trunked radio systems, which at first can seem rather confusing to the listener. They are admittedly worth a great deal of explanation, so I have devoted an entire chapter to them.

These come in many designs, some analogue, and some digital. In this chapter, which I have devoted to the topic of trunked systems, which represent a whole aspect of the hobby in themselves, I am referring to analogue trunked systems. Where I refer to an analogue trunked system, I am implying a system, which certainly uses one or more digital control channels, but the voice transmissions themselves are analogue and can easily be monitored – that is, once you have a means by which to keep track of which user uses which frequencies in the available ‘pool’ – and when. Although an ordinary scanner can monitor the voice channels of an analogue trunked system, it cannot by itself change frequency to follow a conversation when it changes from one voice channel to another. This is particularly true of Motorola systems, where individual transmissions can take place on different frequencies, unlike on MPT1327 systems where a conversation will remain on a given voice channel until it is complete (or handover to another base station takes place).

Trunked systems are designed to maximise available capacity in a two-way radio system by giving groups of users something known as a ‘pool# of frequencies to share for their communications, rather than a single dedicated radio frequency. These are sorted into ‘talk groups’ where a talk group can consist of a single customer organisation, a division of a customer organisation, or a group uf users fom several organistions, depending in their requirements. To explain why it is more effieicnt, I'll compare it to something we are all only too familiar with - queueing at a supermarket.

In a conventional radio system, it is rather like benig stuck in a long queue and unable to change queues, even if you can see other queues which are virtually empty. A trunked system is rather like having a single queue, which is split among multiple cashiers, with any customer at the front able to use the next cashier to become free. This means that all positions are fully utilised, dealing with the customers much more quickly.

Each radio, such as the Motorola GP1200 shown contains a small computer, which communicates with the base stations' central computer, sending data to it on the control channel, on which the central computer can reply. In this way, each radio can signal to the central computer that it wishes to request communication with another such radio on a specific talk-group. The controller sends a control signal to all radios participating in that talkgroup, which instructs one or more radios in that talkgroup to automatically switch to the frequency indicated by the central computer system in order to receive the transmission. After the user is finished speaking, the other radio(s) in that talkgroup are instructed return to monitoring the control channel for further calls. Calls can be either single (for just one user) or group calls (to all users in a given talkgroup).

This arrangement allows multiple talkgroups consisting of a variable number of users to share a relatively small pool of radio frequencies without having to hear all conversations on the system. Trunked systems provide a highly efficient way to optimise spectrum usage, and may also provide other functions which cannot be catered for by a conventional radio system.

"Trunked" radio systems achieve this efficiency because rather than using a frequency for each and every group of users, trunked systems use a pool of channels which are dynamically alocated for many groups of users. In fact the only limitation concerns the maximum number of actual conversations which take place simultaniously. This depends on four factors. The first being of course the number of voice channels available in a given area, the second being the number of users the system caters for, and the third being how much the avarage user makes use of their radios. So a large number of light users, or a small number of heavy users can be accomadated. The fourth factor concerns the time at which the user makes use of their radios, users who operate at night for example do not compete for capacity with those who only operate in the daytime.

In the UK, Analogue trunked systems are mainly to be found in the following areas in the area of the spectrum known as band three, which has been mentioned previously. Since the beginning of 1985, this band has not been used for television in the UK, making it available for other services, which now include SAB, DAB, radio microphones and of course, trunked radio networks.

The allocations for trunked networks are as follows:
Sub band one: 176.5 to 183.5 MHz for base stations, 184.5 to 191.5 MHz for mobiles.
Sub band two: 200.5 to 207.5 MHz for base stations, 192.5 to 199.5 MHz for mobiles.
Sub band three: 209 to 215 MHz.

Sub band one is mainly used by a company called Fleetcomm, which runs a nationwide network offering communications to users such as haulers who need nationwide coverage. There are also a few regional networks in this band. Sub band two is used by regional service providers, and is used my customers who require only communications within a particular area of the country. Also, the bus networks and the National Rail Network operate within this band.

Sub band three has not so far been allocated.

Besides the above, small trunked networks have also appeared in other places in the radio spectrum. For example, the gas and electricity utilities have a trunked system in the 139 to 140 MHz range, 440 to 442.5 MHz contains some trunked systems such as those used in the West Midlands by a shop watch scheme and at Heathrow and Gatwick airports by ground crews. Some trunked systems also exist in the 162 to 168, 453 to 454, and 456 to 457 MHz PBR allocations.

All of the above systems are what are known as MPT1327 trunked networks, which were designed in the UK and are now used throughout Europe, the Far East and Australia in particular.

The other type of trunked system previously mentioned is made by Motorola and is known as Smartzone. There are only three Smartzone systems in use in the UK at present: In London, the metropolitan police use such a system in the 450 to 453 MHz band, which is known as metradio. In Staffordshire, the police and the fire service use such a system, which is called Starnet. Thirdly, at RAF Mildenhall in Suffolk, the US Air force uses a small Smartzone system.

If you don't want to spend any money, there are programs for monitoring both MPT1327 and Smartzone systems from a site in Australia:

http://www.r00t.cz/radio/proglist.php?en=1

To monitor Motorola Smartzone systems, there is a program called 'Trunker' which uses the soundcard as its input. Although I have had some success without a discriminator output, it certainly does not perform to its best. It has the ability to tune a few scanners automatically in order to follow conversations. Given that on a Smartzone system, a query can be on one frequency in the pool used by a given base station, and the reply on a different one, this is just as well! Of course, you will need a second scanner to receive the data. That's the bad news regarding all trunk tracking, unless you happen to own a standalone trunk-tracking scanner. This is ‘Trunker’ in operation.

Alternatively, you can always buy one of the trunk-tracking scanner from Uniden, such as the BC898T shown below. Incidentally, besides Motorola Smartzone, these scanners also have the capability to track other types of trunked network such as EDACS, and LTR. However these types of trunked system are not currently in use in the United Kingdom.

So far as MPT 1327 systems are concerned, you are limited to software tracking systems, since unfortunately the trunk tracking scanners referred to cannot track MPT 1327 systems. The reason for this is that this type of trunking is barely used in the United States, and these scanners are primarily intended for the US market. There are however a number of software trackers which can control a number of scanners which support computer control. This is MPTTrunker, which can be downloaded from the site mentioned above.

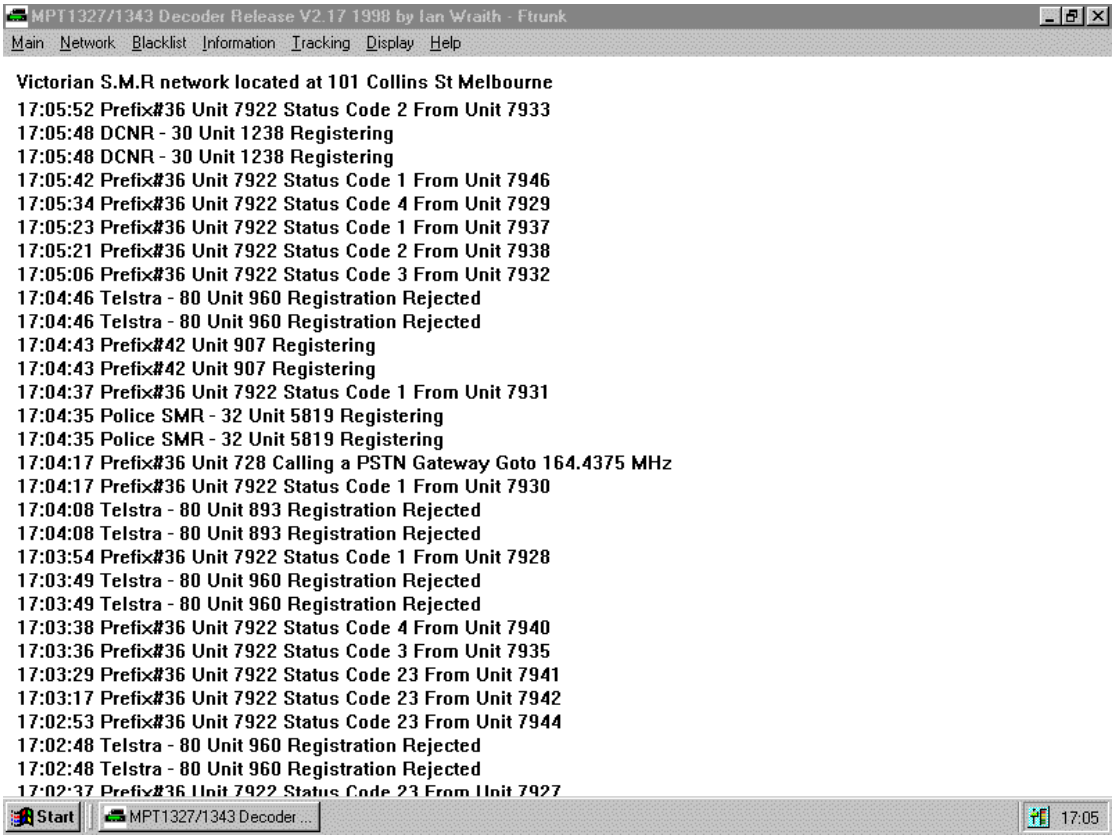
In order for it to display the frequencies in use by the trunked system, you will need to let it monitor each voice channel for one conversation and catch the channel number transmitted. This will need to be added to the configuration file for this network along with the channel number. This only has to be done once, and once all channels are accounted for, it will display the channel number and frequency to tune your scanner to whilst monitoring the control channel.

If you are willing to part with some cash, there are two commercial decoders, which have a graphical user interface and are both from Australia where MPT1327 trunking are widely used.

One of these is Ftrunk, which comes with a hardware modem. It costs $400 (Australian Dollars). This is used by various companies to monitor and troubleshoot their trunked networks, and is therefore well supported. It runs under most versions of Windows.

The modem is supplied with a serial (RS232) cable, which connects it to your computer, and an audio lead for connection to your scanner.



Once you have this set up and your scanner tuned to an MPT1327 control channel, the following information is displayed, from left to right:
Time, Prefix (network number), the unit number, which is the identification number of the radios in question, and the frequency to use for the call. If you know the identity of the user a name can be added.
Ftrunk supports automatic tuning of any scanner supporting computer control. It also lets you add your own channel table for networks which it does not have details for (it comes equipped with details of many networks and the frequencies they use.

Also from Australia is the 'Trunksniffer' package. This is a standalone software package, a shareware version of which can be downloaded from www.trunksniffer.com.
The full version costs €90, which is about sixty pounds in sterling.

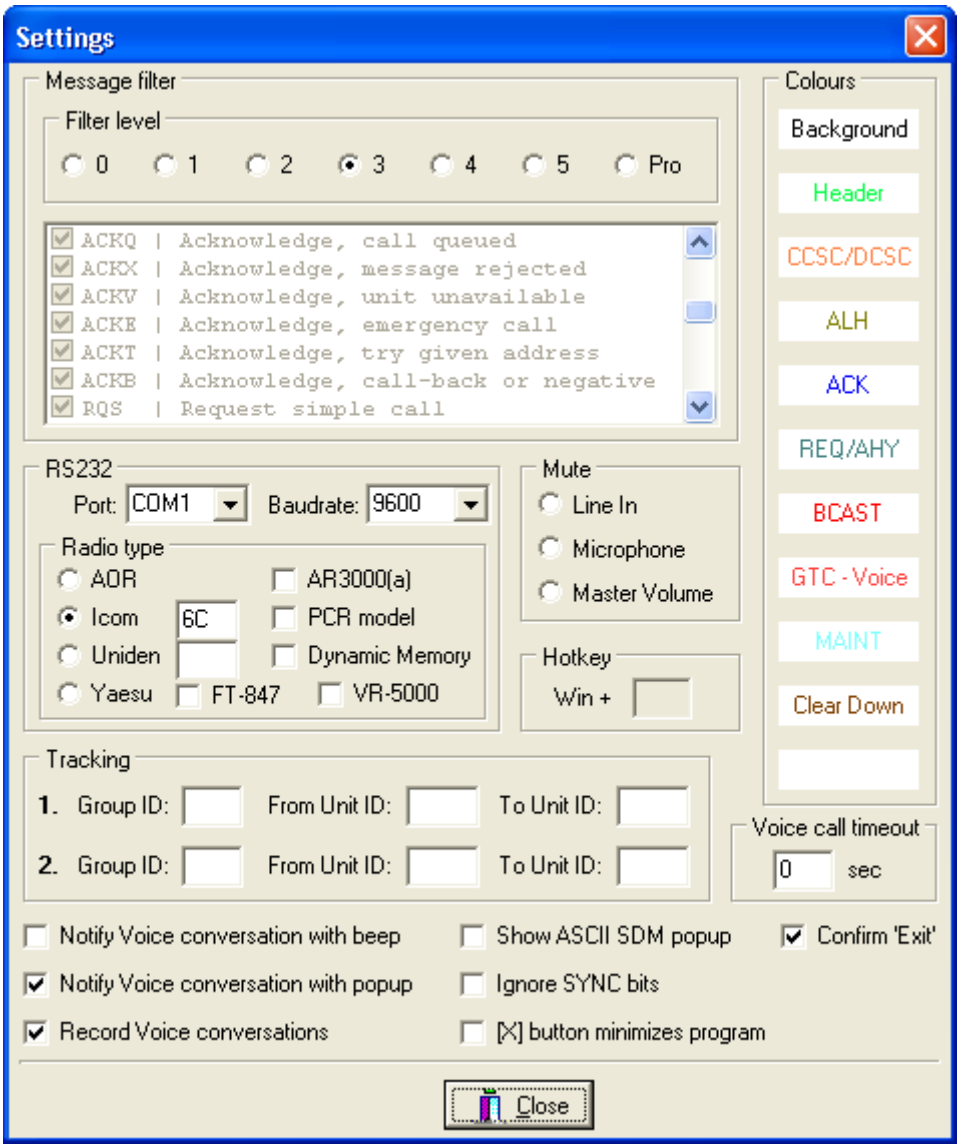
So, MPT 1327 trunked systems users can be tracked on a hobbyists budget, and this means that if a radio user you enjoy monitoring gives up using conventional radio equipment and joins a trunked network, it's not the end of the world. Indeed, the only bad news here is that there is no standalone scanner available which is MPT1327 equipped. This is rather a setback for the listener, but not one, which is insurmountable.

My own MPT1327 receiving set-up is shown below. Of the available MPT1327 decoders I have chosen Trunkview since it is easy to set up and use, and it also has a pleasing user interface.

The Realistic Pro-2004 is tuned to a frequency of 201.8125 MHz, which is a control channel for a trunked system used by the bus operators in my area. This is receiving the data, which is used by TrunkView. It is connected via a cable to the soundcard in the PC; it uses the 'line in' input. The system messages are displayed in 'real time', so if you are quick enough, you can manually tune your scanner to the voice channel on which the conversation is to take place. However, this is simply impractical on all but the smallest systems at reasonably quiet times. So, in reality computer control is a must! For this you will need to have a scanner, which is capable of computer control and a suitable interface cable. Most software provides the output control signal via the serial (RS232) port, the first of which is shown as 'Com1' on most systems in the Windows control panel. Incidentally, you can get USB to serial converters allowing the use of serial devices via USB, but I have not tried this with any scanner and to be honest I would not recommend this approach unless you have no serial port (or your serial port is permanently in use by another device).
The Icom IC-R20 is connected via the 'CIV' interface, using the OPC-478 cloning cable, which is used for PC cloning of an IC-R2, IC-R3 or IC-R10 receiver. Other radios will require a similar interface. See your manual for details.

If you are handy with a soldering iron and have the circuit diagram available (some can be found online, so try using a search engine), you can perhaps save some money and construct one for yourself. Take care though, the serial output from the PC is at 12 volts and this cannot be interfaced directly to the scanner, as permanent damage to circuitry will certainly occur. Your interface will need to include a voltage level converter. These can also be purchased, for example, this is the CT-17 from Icom, which can control up to four radios from a single PC.

You will need to correctly configure your software for the radio and interface in question. This, for instance, is the correct configuration of TrunkView for use with the IC-R20.

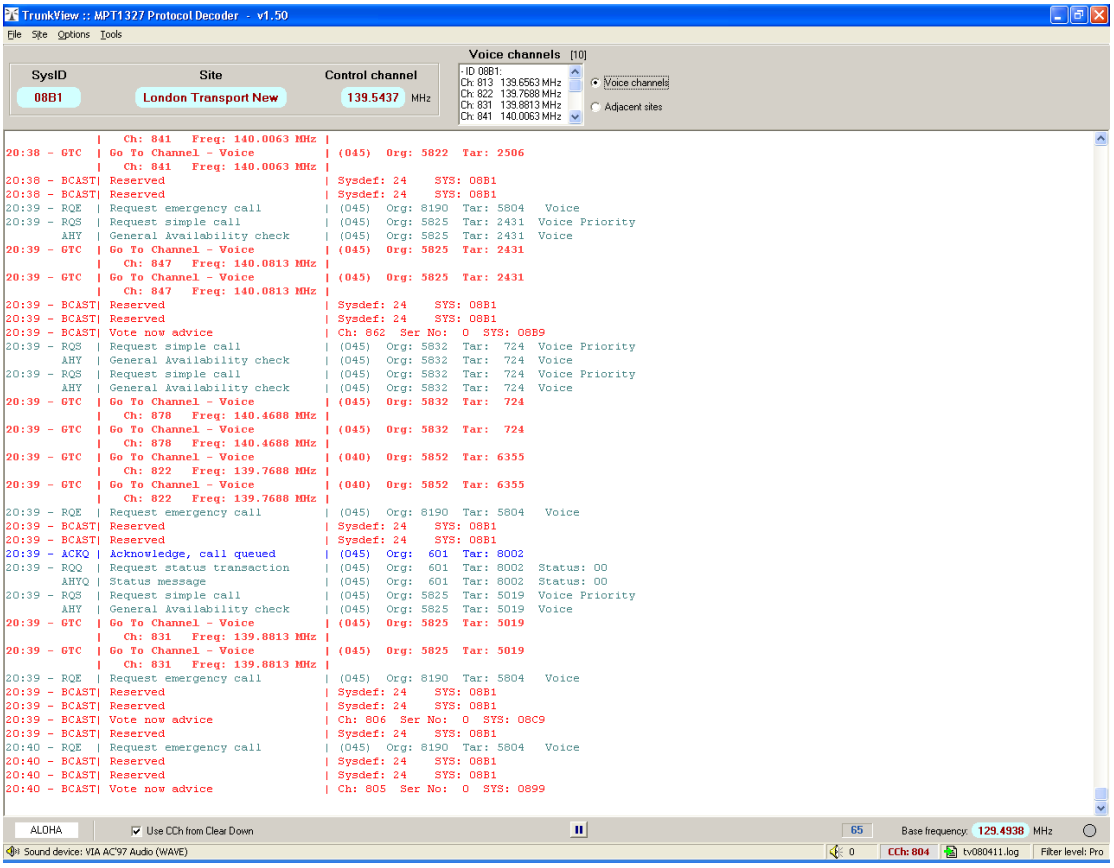


For any of the programs to correctly display the frequency for a given channel, you will need to work out the frequency of the first channel. In the MPT1327 specification, channels are numbered in order of: channel spacing X channel number from the first channel upwards. The 'base frequency' corresponds to channel 0, with channel 1 being the first actually used. For band three, sub band one extends from 201.2125 which is channel one, to 183.5 MHz, which is channel 504. For sub band two, 201.2 MHz is channel 0 and 207.5 is channel 504. It is well worth noting that not every channel in the sequence is used by an individual base site; some are used by adjoining sites and others are in use by other users or networks.

Monitoring a trunked network may seem complex and you may feel put off. But remember that once you have your decoder set up you will find that it is dead easy to do. You can automatically screen out users and even groups which you are not interested in monitoring by specifying which you wish you do wish to monitor, as soon as you know the unit and/or group identification numbers. This makes monitoring users of even a large and complex system such as the Fleetcomm network easy enough. The only downside of this is that you will be tied to the PC. But you can always record the day's activity to browse through later on; TrunkView even has the capability to do this built in. It also lists all of the voice channels in use by the site you are monitoring.

However, on a small trunked system with say three or four channels (or even ten, if activity is not too excessive) it is possible to monitor without any trunk tracking equipment, and at little inconvenience. Even for a large trunked system, decoding the control channels can make the hobby more fun, even if more of a challenge, since it is now quite easy for a computer controlled scanner to select users of a shared system which you find interesting without you having to sit through those you find boring. Compare this to a conventional CBS using CTCSS – if say there are twenty users of which six are interesting to listen to, you will have to program in six duplicates of the frequency each with a different CTCSS tone – that is, as soon as you have identified the tone used by each!

To map a trunked system, you need to first find the 'base frequency' corresponding to channel 0. You will need to tune your scanner to a control channel, and note the channel number displayed. Base frequency is equal to the control or voice channel frequency minus (channel number X channel spacing). For example, for 179.9 MHz, using 12.5 KHz channel spacing, 179.9 – (channel 728 X 0.0125 MHz) = 179.9 – 9.1 MHz = 170.8 MHz. Although this is outside sub-band 1, this result is in fact correct since the channel numbers in sub band 1 do not start at 0. Having entered the site identity number (used to recognise the system in future; these numbers are in hexadecimal), a network name, the channel spacing (normally 12.5 KHz in the UK), the control channel frequency and the base frequency you calculated earlier, you should find that Trunkview displays the correct frequency and channel number as calls are made on the network.



At the top of the display, you will see a list of voice channels displayed. The best time to let Trunkview find voice channels is when the network is busy; leaving it running for an hour at a peak time is better than leaving it running overnight. To find all voice channels at a given site, you need to choose a busy time so that all possible voice channels are used.
Once you have all the site's voice channels, you may wish to repeat the procedure for any adjacent sites, which Trunkview finds. To do this, you need to select the 'adjacent sites' button and provided that Trunkview has overheard adjacent site announcements on the network, you will have a list of site identity numbers and the control channel numbers. The frequencies can be found from the channel lookup feature (press F9). You can then repeat the procedure for each adjacent site, provided that all of them are in range of your location. If you can hear their control channels, they are in range.
This is an example of the output:

- ID 08C9:
Ch: 815 139.68125 MHz
Ch: 824 139.79375 MHz
Ch: 833 139.90625 MHz
Ch: 853 140.15625 MHz
Ch: 869 140.35625 MHz

These are voice channels in use at the site whose control channel you are decoding. The frequencies are correct provided that you have entered the correct base frequency.

There were four adjacent sites found in this example. You can enter their details using the ‘site details’ panel (Control-D) . You will need to convert the control channel numbers to their respective frequencies to enter them, use the channel lookup facility under the tools menu. Once you have repeated the procedure for each of the sites, you now have a complete map of the network. Although this procedure (and the subsequent programming of the frequency list into your scanner) is tedious, it need only be done once. A PC programmable scanner is recommended for a job like this!

Given how relatively inexpensive trunked radio equipment now is, and given the great improvements in spectral efficiency afforded by trunked systems, they are here to stay. For better, or for worse.

The Tait TM8255 MPT 1327 mobile transceiver is a recent example of a MPT 1327 trunked radio. It also operates in ‘conventional’ mode, i.e. as a standard two way radio. It is being introduced by London Transport on the new ‘Ibus’ system, which is replacing the existing trunked system in band three (sub band two), which is showing its age. The new network operates in the 139.5 to 140.5 MHz band (mobiles +8.5 MHz), with 12.5 KHz channel spacing (6.25 KHz offset). This band is still used by gas and electricity companies in some parts of the UK.

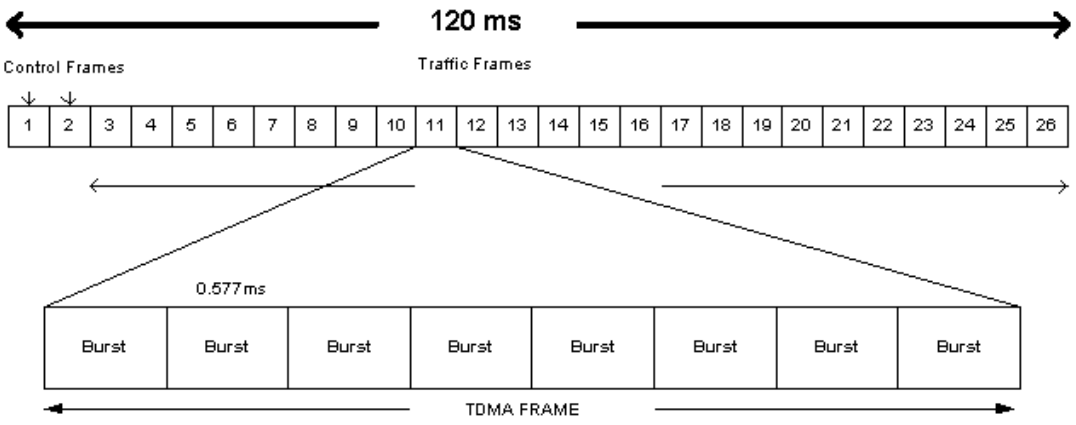
8) Digital Radio Systems – To Monitor or not to Monitor?

Digital radio is causing a great deal of confusion in the hobbyist fraternity right at the moment. Myths and rumours abound. Some say that scanning doesn't have a future to new digital systems. Others insist that 'there has got to be a way' to monitor these systems. So who is right?

The answer lies somewhere between the two extremes. Or, to be more precise, it depends very much on the system in question. So, after giving a basic introduction to what digital radio is really about (and what it's not), I'll describe what the future holds in the face of digital radio. And I will try to avoid complicated explanations, which are likely to add to the confusion.

The best way to explain digital radio is by comparison with analogue systems with which you are already familiar.

In the case of analogue transmitters, the audio voice waveform is converted into a corresponding electrical waveform by the microphone, which is then amplified, in order to more easily be utilised by the following circuitry. This circuitry mixes the audio signal with the carrier wave so as to modulate it. The earliest method widely used was amplitude modulation, AM. This simple method (in terms of the circuitry needed to modulate and demodulate the audio signal) simply varies the power of the transmitter – louder audio means a greater power output. Alternatively frequency modulation (FM) slightly varies the frequency of the carrier, and so on. This is rather straightforward really and although the circuitry employed has been improved over the years, and a few extra enhancements, such as CTCSS and DCS, for example, have been devised, the basic operation of an analogue transmitter has not really changed since the early days of radio. But analogue transmissions have their shortcomings. Firstly, selectivity can be a problem, since an extremely string signal on an adjacent frequency (for example, one 12.5KHz channel away) can render the message unintelligible). Secondly, analogue transmissions can be overheard by anyone with a receiver within receiving range. This may not always be desirable. It is difficult to encrypt an analogue transmission effectively, so messages are not secure from for example, business competitors who might make use of the information, although this is illegal in most countries. Then there is the problem that the sender of a communication can never be sure that the recipient can even in fact hear them – hence the need to repeat messages.
But of course, analogue transmissions can prove to be inefficient, in the sense that only one user within transmitting range at any given time can use each frequency in use. This became a major issue with the early ETACS cellular telephone network, which in spite of additional frequencies loaned to the cellular service providers by the government, could not really cope with the level of demand which far exceeded early expectations. Analogue trunked networks attempt to solve this problem as described earlier. On the other hand, digital systems can accommodate multiple conversations on a single frequency using a technique known as time division multiplexing, or TDMA. The example below is for GSM, used by second-generation cellular telephone systems, although other digital systems use similar schemes. For example, TETRA divides each frame into four slots.

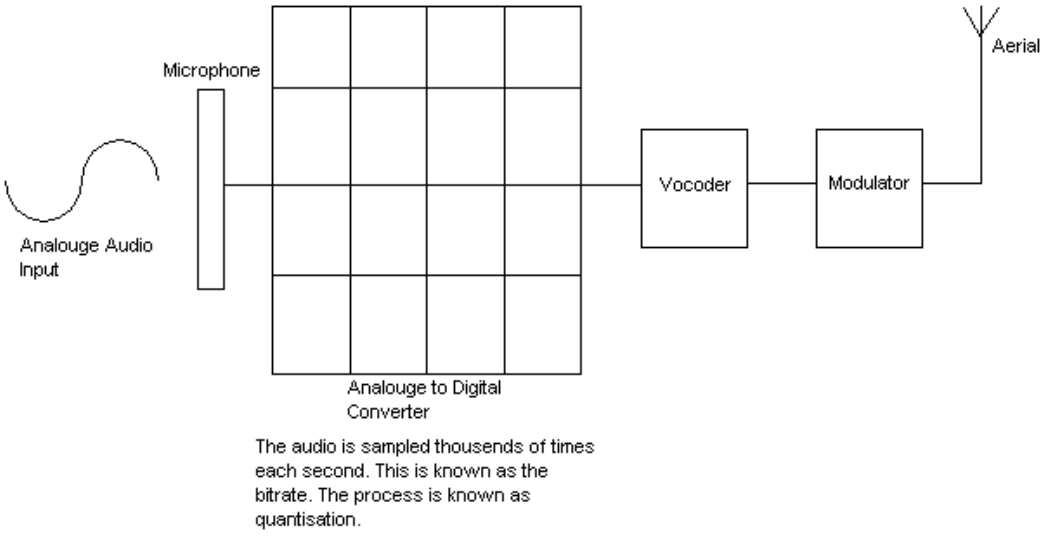


With much simplification, this is how a digital radio transmitter operates. As in the case of analogue radio, the audio is converted by the microphone into a corresponding electrical waveform, which is then amplified. But rather than using it to directly modulate the carrier waveform directly, it is fed into an integrated circuit which, at intervals a fraction of a millisecond apart, measures the amplitude and generates a corresponding binary number. Whereas ordinary decimal numbers have a base of ten, binary numbers have a base of two and a bit can only have a value of 0 or 1. Therefore, for example, a sixteen-bit analogue to digital converter can output binary values between 0000000000000000 and 1111111111111111 in binary, or 0 and 65535 in decimal. For example, the value 31994 is 111110011111010. If you are familiar with digital audio you will be aware that the sound quality depends on both the sampling rate and the number of bits – the larger these values, the more accurate the representation of the waveform can be.

A vocoder then optimises the amount of data for transmission. The mathematics involved is complex, but the operation itself is easily explained. If, for instance the person transmitting stops speaking for a few seconds while continuing to press the PTT, the analogue to digital converter will output a long stream of zeros. Since this data contains much redundancy, the vocoder stops outputting data during this time allowing the transmitter to power off until the person begins to speak once again. This also has the useful advantage of saving battery power as well as reducing the quantity of data needing to be transmitted.

Finally, the output of the above processes is used to modulate the carrier wave in some way. It is of course worth pointing out that even where no encryption is used, a scanner capable of monitoring one digital system cannot automatically decode all unencrypted digital systems! This is because there are many different vocoders in use, which are mutually incompatible, different modulation schemes are used, with C4FM, DQPSK and GMSK being three examples, and also there are various different checksum formulae in use. Not to mention different channel spacing, and in the case of TDMA, differing numbers of slots per frame, for instance TETRA has four but GSM eight.

This block diagram illustrates the basic operation of a minimal digital radio transmitter. A receiver has these same stages, only in reverse order.



Basic operation of a digital radio transmitter. A receiver has the same stages in reverse.

Another variant of TDMA is that employed by both CT2 and DECT cordless telephones, which is known as 'digital ping pong'. This operates by transmitting a few milliseconds of digitally recorded audio and transmitting the information in a fraction of the recording time. This allows the base and handset to transmit alternately using the same frequency. Indeed, DECT takes this concept a stage further by allowing up to twelve separate phones (both base and handset) to use the same channel simultaneously!

Apart from spectral efficiency, another advantage afforded by digital techniques is called error correction. In simple terms, this operates by means of something called a checksum. This is produced by generating, from each binary number generated by the analogue to digital converter, a second binary value, which is known as the checksum. The means of generation involves a complex mathematical formula, but the purpose of the checksum is again quite straightforward. At the receiver, the data received is compared with the received checksum, in order to ensure that each binary number has the expected value. If not, then the data is erroneous due to perhaps interference or a momentary loss of reception. In this case, the receiving radio can either ask the transmitter to quickly re-transmit the data, or it may attempt to calculate the correct value using a second mathematical formula.

There are many different types of digital communication system in use today, which recent advances in radio technology have made possible. I'll briefly describe those you might encounter or read about, and whether these can potentially be monitored.

TETRA (Trans European Trunked Radio)

Now, here comes some really bad news, from a scanner enthusiast's point of view. Unlike analogue transmissions, digital transmissions can be very securely encrypted to prevent interception. Due to the huge key sizes involved, decryption by trying every key in succession would take such an astronomical amount of time, that it is, for all intents and purposes, impossible. As a good enough example, TETRA 'end to end' encryption (the most secure form of encryption allowed by the TETRA standard) has a 128-bit key, as does UMTS, used by third generation cellular telephones. To put this into perspective, a 128 bit binary key has a total of 340282366920938463463374707431768 possible values! So unless the mathematical formula has a weakness waiting to be discovered, permitting a 'shortcut' allowing decryption without the need for the calculation of the exact key, please don't even ask whether a scanner will ever be available which can monitor the new Airwave service used by the police (and possibly soon the other emergency services), or UMTS, for example. The only sane, rational or honest answer has to be no I am afraid. In fact, in the case of TETRA, even the control channels are encrypted! This means that even a TETRA trunk-tracking program cannot be implemented. By 'end to end' encryption, I mean that other terminals cannot even decrypt the communications or base stations on the TETRA network; it can only be decrypted at the individual terminals taking part in the communication. Specialist police units, such as anti-terrorist units, will normally use this particular type of very strong encryption.

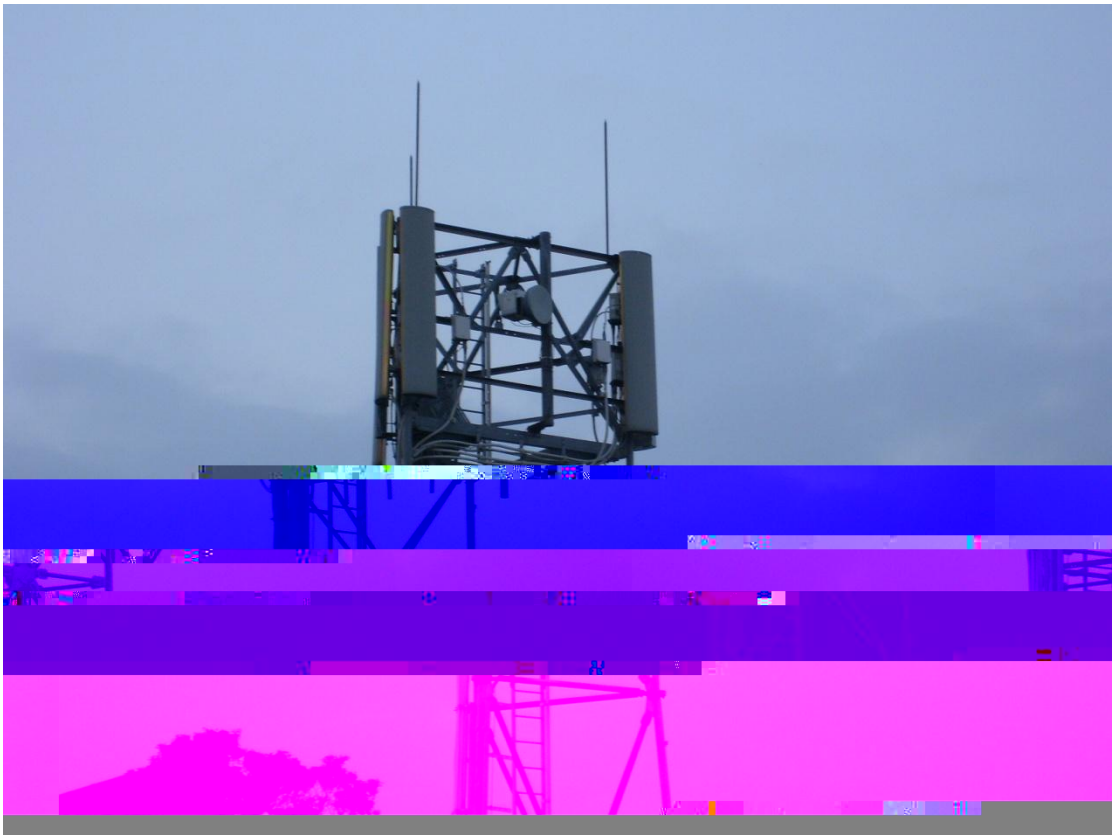
Normal police operations are likely to use the less secure TEA1 or TEA2 encryption algorithms, which do not provide end-to-end encryption, but are still far to secure for keys to be calculated in a reasonable amount of time. The Airwave TETRA network base stations transmit on frequencies between 390 and 395 MHz, with the mobile units exactly 10MHz lower. These sound like a continuous buzz to the listener.

GSM Digital Telephones

In the UK and most other countries, GSM (Groupe Speciale Mobile) base stations transmit in the 935 to 960 and 1805 to 1880 MHz. (In the United States, they use the 1900 MHz area, so your own mobile will not work in the US unless you have a so called tri-band phone). The mobiles transmit 45 and 95 MHz lower, respectively. If you tune your scanner to the base station frequencies, you will hear an electronic whine sounding somewhat like computer hash – an all too familiar sound to many listeners! This cannot be decoded into the constituent voice calls taking place in each of the 8 time divisions, because an encryption scheme known as A5 is used to prevent this. Equipment capable of decrypting GSM traffic does exist, but costs many thousands of pounds putting it a bit beyond the hobbyist's budget! Although I understand that the microwave links between base stations and the telephone exchanges are not encrypted, they are almost impossible to monitor in practice since they are highly directional (almost like a narrow torch beam), so that interception is highly unlikely. Also, monitoring at such very high frequencies is difficult and costly, requiring specialised equipment. Thirdly, the links are still multiplexed, so a complex decoder would still be required. For all these reasons, GSM is beyond the monitoring capability of hobbyists.

This is a typical cellular telephone base station, operating in the 900MHz band. The antennas are arranged to provide tri-angular coverage of the surrounding area. These are sector panels, which offer a compromise between gain and angular coverage. (The 1800MHz and 2100 MHz panels are identical in design, except that the shorter wavelength means that for a given gain, the panels are physically smaller). Another area in which sector panels are commonly used is in the 2.4 GHz ISM band, where they are used in wireless networking. Typical gain is in the 5 to 24 dB range. The circular dish is for the microwave link connecting the base station with the network infrastructure.



UMTS (Universal Mobile Telephone System) – More bad news

Unlike TETRA and GSM, which utilise time division multiple access (TDMA), UMTS, which is utilised by so-called third-generation cellular telephones, uses CDMA, which stands for Code Division Multiple Access. This is rather a strange type of encoding, but I'll do my best to explain it in the simplest possible terms. Rather than using channels a few kHz wide, UMTS uses 5MHz wide channels, in which each phone transmits on all frequencies simultaneously! This seems strange but all phones constantly change their power output up to 1500 times every second under the instruction of the base station, so that all phones in contact with the base station provide precisely the same signal strength. This is to prevent any one phone from jamming the other phone's signals.
Each phone has what is called a spreading code, which is a unique binary number worldwide. This allows the base station computer to distinguish the signal from each phone. The base stations likewise are constantly adjusting their power output giving the minimum signal strength, which provides reliable communications.
CDMA provides sufficient bandwidth to allow high-speed data communications as would be required for high-speed Internet access or video streaming. The actual bandwidth is dependent on the state of the network and other factors.
The phones themselves transmit between1900 and 1970 MHz, the base stations between 2110 and 2170MHz. However due to the 5MHz bandwidth of the channels, you will find you won't actually hear a UMTS signal if you can tune your scanner to such high frequencies; the signals will simply sound like white noise. If your scanner has a band scope, try setting it to step in 100 kHz intervals across say 10 MHz of the spectrum. If you have a reasonably strong UMTS base station nearby, the UMTS signal will show up as a 5MHz wide pulse.

device known as a terminal emulator used to input data for transmission and display received data. Inevitably, the ubiquitous PC is taking over from the TNC, with the modem implemented entirely in software. The station can be configured to receive messages whilst the operator is away. Also, radios are available with built-in TNC's, allowing connection directly to the computer in question.

The protocol used is known as AX.25, and you can decode the traffic using any available software, which is able to decode AX.25. In some cases, the software is able to decode the data using the sound card as an interface – you need to simply connect the audio output of your receiver to the 'line in' jack of your sound card.

Radio amateurs can communicate with the international space station by means of packet radio as well as by voice, since some astronauts and cosmonauts are radio amateurs who may, just every once in a while, find some time free to get on the air!

UISS is an example of a software TNC that runs under Windows, and utilises the system soundcard.

Paknet

This is a data network operated by Vodaphone in the UK. These high-speed data transmissions sound rather like a high-pitched lorry engine and can be found between 164 and 164.5 MHz. The Paknet network covers just about the whole of the UK population and so you should be able to recognise the transmissions. The Paknet network serves to link various data terminals with a centralised computer system. For example, some remote alarms use the Paknet network to signal their status to their control systems, and some portable terminals use the system to process payments made with credit or debit cards. There are various other schemes, which utilise the Paknet system, such as industrial remote control systems (although some use the 'licence free data' scheme or Mobitex instead, see below). But no decoders are available as of yet since the technical details of the system have not been released.

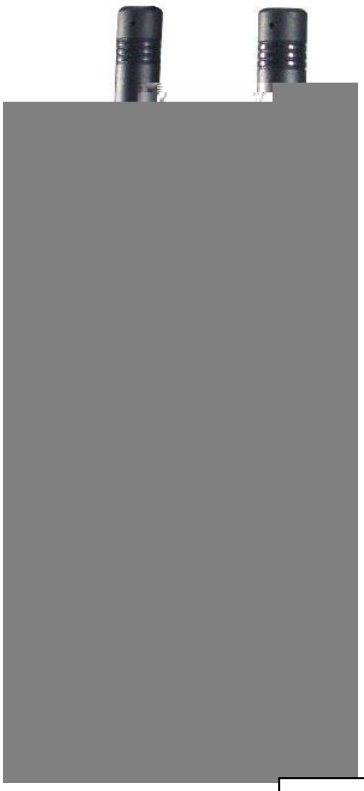
Mobitex

This system dates back to the late 1980's and was developed by Ericsson. This has since become a worldwide standard, so some decoders are available, including PDW, which has been mentioned previously, since it also decodes FLEX, ERMES and POCSAG paging in addition to ACARS. Mobitex does however use a very fast data



There are still a number of video transmissions to be found though in this part of the spectrum, including wireless security cameras, video baby monitors, amateur television and for the lucky, you may get an aerial view of your neighbourhood from a news-crew's helicopter filming shots for the local or national news.

One device I recently came across is a dedicated video scanner covering 900 to 2700 MHz, which encompasses all of the above transmissions. This is made by Misumi Electronics in Taiwan. This comes supplied with aerials for the 1220 and 2400 MHz area as shown. This sells at time of writing for about £300 sterling; it is now available from Maplin Electronics in the UK.

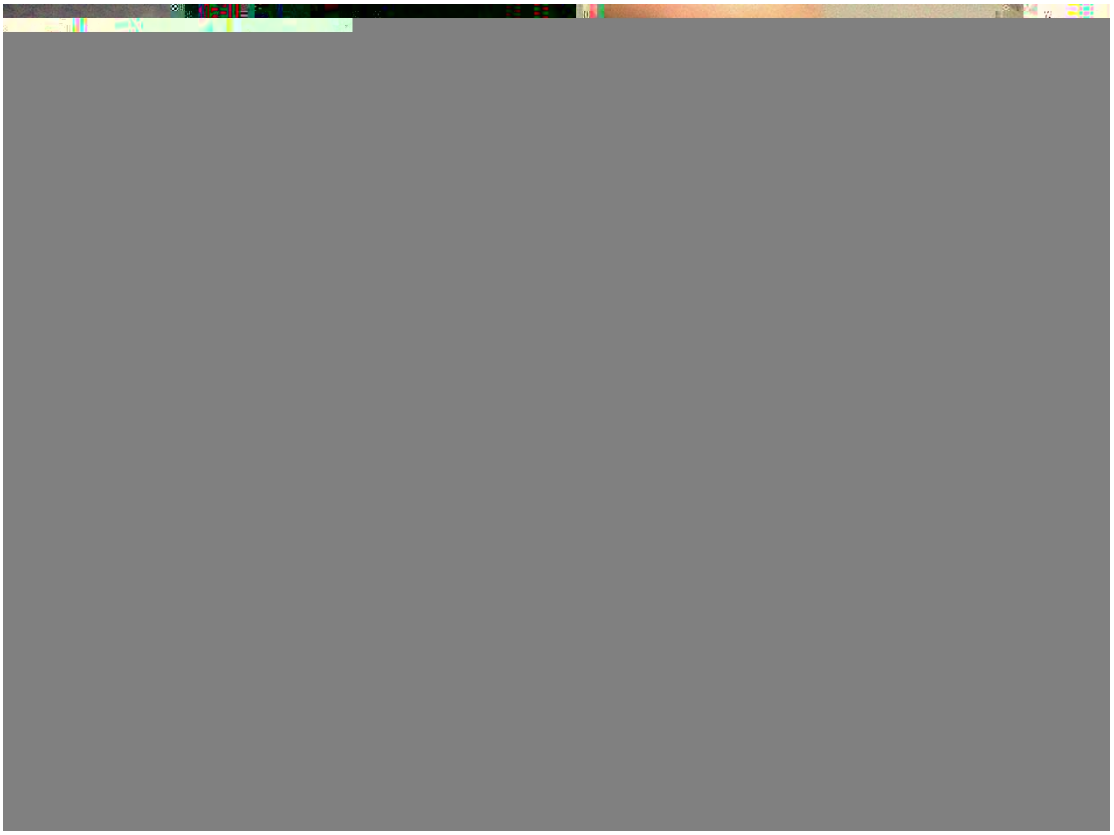
Also available is the 'Videoscanner' shown here, which sports a 5 inch screen and sells for about £150. This covers only 2300 to 2600 MHz, so cannot receive 23cm ATV transmissions. It does however receive most of the video signals in the 13cm area. Unlike the wireless video receiver mentioned earlier, it does not provide any means by which to connect an external high gain aerial, such as those used in wireless networking. A pity!



The IC-R3 tuned to a wireless camera on 2468 MHz, outside the advertised range which ends at 2450 MHz. Allowing full coverage of the ISM band up to 2483 MHz and beyond.

Also, another band which is becoming popular for wireless cameras (and in fact more often, directional point to point video links, as well as domestic video senders, is the licence exempt 5.8 GHz band. This band offers much shorter range and less building penetration than on lower frequencies, but does have the attraction of far less interference from other devices(such as bluetooth devices, wireless networking and microwave ovens) which can be a problem in the 2.4 GHz area. So far the PGVS-125 wireless camera hunter is the only video scanner I have found which officers coverage of this band. It also covers the 1.2 and 2.4 GHz bands, and supports all three television standards (PAL, NTSC and SECAM). However, at around £1000, this is an option for wealthy enthusiasts only!

The next image shows a typical 5.8 GHz wireless camera. The downward facing transparent cover protects the infra-red camera itself from the elements. This is a rotary camera which can be pointed in any direction of interest. The lamp (top right) is an infra-red lamp which illuminates the immediate area at night. The yagi design gives away the frequency of operation (to those in the know') and the location of the control room. The sensors lower down detect movement (this controls the orientation of the camera).

Band	Frequency	General Characteristics
11 meters	25.67–26.10 MHz	Very few broadcasters use this band. Daytime reception is poor when the sunspot cycle is not favourable, night reception is rare. Some regional activity in a few parts of the world.
13 Metres	21.45-21.5 MHz	Unreliable in daytime, but used in Asia & Pacific Regions mainly. Nighttime reception is rare.
15 Metres	18.90–19.02 MHz	Good daytime reception mainly in Summer months. Reception rarely lasts beyond nightfall even in summer. Usage is infrequent.
16 meters	17.48–17.90 MHz	Daytime reception good and quite reliable, at night there can be useful reception mainly in the summer.
19 meters	15.00–15.825 MHz	Daytime reception mainly good, night reception variable, but best in summer.
22 meters	13.57–13.87 MHz	Broadly similar to 19 meters; nighttime reception in particular is best in summer.
25 meters	11.50–12.05 MHz	Generally best during summer; reception can last some time after sunset.
31 meters	9250–9995 kHz	One of the best all round nighttime bands; but can be seasonal during the day, with reception tending to be better in winter.
41 meters	7100–7350 kHz	Reception reports often vary by region. Good night reception throughout the year, can be variable during the daytime particularly in summer.
49 meters	5900–6300 kHz	Good night reception at any time of year; daytime reception is often poor.
60 meters	4750–5100 kHz	Mostly relatively local use in tropical regions, but long distance use possible at night.
75 meters	3900–4050 kHz	Mostly relatively local use in tropical regions, some long distance use possible at night.
90 meters	3200–3400 kHz	Local use in tropical regions as MW reception hampered by static.
120 meters	2300–2495 kHz	Local use in tropical regions as MW reception hampered by static. This is in fact a MF band.

Marine HF Allocations

As with Aviation, marine operation reverts to HF frequencies when out of VHF range (although larger operators from wealthier nations have largely migrated to satellite systems in Lieu of HF telephony). However, there is still enough traffic on HF for it to be worth listening out for. Yachtsmen and fishing fleets in particular are often to be heard on the following frequencies. As on VHF, both simplex and duplex allocations are available.

72.8-74.8 MHz	Government. Program making & Special Events (PMSE). 72.8 to 73.925 is used for MOD Tactical Communications, 25 kHz spacing.
74.8-75.2 MHz	Civil Runway Marker Beacons (75 MHz). Military transport, ground, tactical channels and links.
75.2-76.7 MHz	Government-the allocation is mainly for military use, any civil requirements being co-coordinated by the MOD. May still be in use by HM Customs & Excise. Programme making & Special Events from 75.25 to 75.3 MHz. 75.3 to 76.7 used by the US Air force (ground and base security), Ministry of Defence Police and the Territorial Army, mainly in rural areas.
76.7-80.0 MHz	Private Business Radio services from 76.70625-77.99375 MHz. Extended range cordless telephone (Being phased out) portable unit transmitters on 77.5125 MHz or 77.5500 MHz. The base unit transmitter operates on 47.43125 MHz or 47.41875 MHz. Government. Programme making & Special Events on frequencies agreed with the MOD. Some US air base security. Some Program Making & Special Events.
80.0-82.5 MHz	Fire Mobiles in the band 80.0-81.5 & 83.5-84 MHz (base in the 70.5 to 71.5 MHz range).
82.5-87.5 MHz	Search and rescue from 86.3125. The band 80.5-82.5 MHz is protected for Radio Astronomy within 48 km of Cambridge). Programme making & Special Events channels are to be found in the band. Industrial Scientific & Medical operates in the band 83.996-84.004 MHz. PBR base stations in 81.5875-86.2875 MHz range, mobiles –13.5MHz. Private Business Radio 86.7125-87.4875 MHz (VHF Low Band, mobiles –10MHz). Under used these days due largely to the large aerials needed. This is in spite of the ranges on offer in rural areas. The bands are less suited to urban areas however.
87.5-108.0 MHz	FM broadcast band (WFM). Your standard FM radio, known to engineers as band 2. Surprisingly, two sections of this band were used for emergency service and PBR communications as recently as the 1980s.
108.0-117.975 MHz	Aeronautical navigation beacons. Constant carrier with Morse code identifier. Silent carrier for the majority of the time.
117.975-137.0 MHz	Aeronautical Traffic Control Band. Unique at VHF/UHF as it uses AM for the entire service. Also unique as 8 1/3 kHz channels have been interleaved between the original 25kHz channels. EPIRB beacons (distress beacons) operate on 121.5 MHz, as well as 243 MHz. See civil aviation section.
137.0-138.0 MHz	Satellite downlink services in this band, including weather

169.84375-173.09375 MHz Private Business Radio This band contains the mobile stations paired with 163.03125 -168.24375 MHz. The duplex split is 4.8 MHz.

173.09375-174.0 MHz Various. Alarms operate on 173.1875 MHz. 173.20-173.35 MHz and radio microphones use 173.7-174.0 MHz. Radio deaf aids from173.35 to174.0 MHz (very short range). Wideband radio microphones use 173.8-175.0 MHz. Some remaining emergency service use in Scotland.

174.0-181.7 MHz Trunked (MPT1327) System base stations and Radio Microphones. Sub Band 1 for trunked PBR from 177.20625 to 181.69375 MHz. The base stations use this range; the mobiles transmit 8 MHz higher. Users include the national Fleetcom network, and a number of other wide coverage trunked networks. Radio deaf aids use 174.0-174.415 MHz. Wide band radio microphones (wideband FM) use 174.0 to175.0 MHz. NFM radio microphones use 174.6 to175.020.
Professional short range radio microphones (licensable) use the sub bands 174.0-175.1, 176.3-176.5, 176.9-177.1 MHz. Long range microphones operate in the ranges 175.15-175.35, 175.425-175.625, 176.5-176.7 and 176.7-176.9 MHz.

181.7-181.8 MHz Programme making & Special Events. Radio Microphones and broadcasting links.

181.8-183.5 MHz Trunked (MPT1327) System base stations, Sub Band 1. Generally Small MPT1327 trunked systems, plus the national Fleetcom network. Mobile transmit + 8 MHz.

183.5-184.5 MHz Remote Meter Reading. Remote meter readers are handheld telemetry terminals, which can read a compatible meter over short range, avoiding a need for the meter reader to enter a building.

184.5-185.2 MHz Radio Microphones. Another band for programme making and

15) The Future

One of my bugbears is that some killjoys will keep ranting on about how this hobby has no future. So - lets clarify this. The truth is that whereas the blue light services are now off limits to us hobbyists all thanks to the Airwave TETRA network, which has advanced layers of security including strong encryption. Which we all knew was coming for years. (Although at least the 'Fireground' communications at 457 MHz will remain analogue; worth a try if there is a large fire or other incident near you.) And indeed, the cellular networks have been off limits for some years.
However, the proliferation of APCO25 digital scanners in the United States has served to illustrate that (given that the transmissions are not encrypted, and an adequate sized market exists) it is feasible to make digital capable scanners.
I have been interested to hear about MOTORBRO on a number of occasions in the Radiouser magazine. These transmissions sound rather like APCO25 on air and are now very common here in the capital. Since these transmissions are not encrypted and MOTORBRO is an open standard, there is already a Linux program 'DSD' or Digital Speech Decoder' allowing these signals to be decoded. And rumour has it that this mode may soon be built into scanners in the near future, just as voice inversion descrambling capability was before it. So if users in your area have replaced their analogue radios with MTORBRO radios, don't despair!
I have also been following with interest news relating to the cracking of the DECT standard used by digital cordless telephones and other devices (see www.dedected.org), and even the A5 algorithm used by GSM.
Also, much equipment is becoming available which was unheard of when I set out, such as dedicated video scanners, software defined radio, besides digital capable scanners and numerous software decoders for various data signals. The PC is becoming an increasingly useful tool to the hobbyist when it comes to programming equipment also. Not to mention the fact that much equipment is becoming increasingly affordable for hobbyist usage. So don't give up just yet!
